The total amount recommended for the various appropriations affecting the public-school system of the District of Columbia, which includes public works under the school-building program, is $12,150,530. This is an increase of $146,515 over the current year and a decrease under the Budget estimates of $5,600.

TEACHERS

The estimate submitted for the pay of teachers was $5,512,920, an increase of $250,280 over the current year. This increase was made up as follows: $101,780 for salary increases for 2,666 teachers (not including 14 annual substitutes), $3,300 on account of longevity pay, and $145,200 for the pay of 95 additional teachers that were requested for the fiscal year 1929. These 95 additional positions embraced 40 class 1–A teachers for the elementary schools, 37 class 2–A and 16 class 2–C teachers for junior high schools, and 2 class 3–A teachers for senior high schools. After an extensive hearing on the public-school needs and requirements for the next fiscal year, every angle of which was gone thoroughly into, there is recommended a total of $5,841,920 for the pay of teachers, an increase over the present year of $179,280. This increase includes the estimate of $101,780 for the salary increases affecting the present regular teacher force of 2,666 positions, the estimate of $3,300 on account of longevity pay, and $74,200 for the pay of 50 additional teachers instead of the estimate of $145,200 for the pay of 95 additional teachers. The committee has made a reduction in this allocation of $71,000 and reduced the number of additional teachers from 95 to 50.

After going carefully over the additional teacher needs of the school system, school by school and classroom by classroom, the committee feels fully justified in making this reduction of 45 teachers, and is of the opinion that with the 50 new positions granted there will be an ample number of teachers to take care of the number of pupils estimated for 1929. Included in with the 95 additional positions estimated for, there were 40 elementary-teacher positions. The committee has refused to recommend 30 out of these 40 positions, the school officials indicating their accord with the committee's action. In the elementary schools one teacher was asked for at the Conduit Road and the same position was carried as a principal in the administrative group. Four teachers were asked for the Langdon School addition which will not be ready for use. There is an admitted surplus of 15 to 18 kindergarten teachers in the schools. Also there is a surplus of a possible 55 itinerant or supplementary teachers which are to be replaced gradually by a fewer number of supervisors and the teachers placed on duty as regular classroom teachers. The school officials estimate that from 10 to 20 can be so transferred within the coming fiscal year. So while the figures indicate a denial of 30 elementary-teacher positions requested, there will be teachers available for the positions requested in that grade, the committee merely having effected an economy by transferring surplus teachers to that work.

The balance of 10 elementary-school teacher positions, which the committee has allowed, will carry the elementary-school work along without difficulty, and if the transfers are made as estimated there will be a saving in these salaries. The committee is meeting the wishes of the school officials in not forcing these transfers to a greater number than is indicated. The committee is of the opinion that even a part of this increase covering these 10 positions will not be used. The estimates included 35 additional junior high-school teacher positions to take care of an estimated increase of 300 pupils. The committee was of the opinion that the estimate was excessive. It has allowed 20 positions out of the 35 requested, or one teacher for each 15 pupils estimated and to take care of any needed adjustments. Here, again, the committee is of the opinion that the positions granted represent a liberal allowance and anticipates that a part of this number will not be used.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SEGER. The gentleman made a statement in respect to the enrollment in the junior high schools and the high schools. Does he know what the load per teacher is of pupils in the elementary schools of the city of Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I will insert a table taken from the Bureau of Efficiency report.

Table showing loads of elementary school-teachers in Washington and seven other cities, March–April, 1927

[NOTE.—All averages are based upon actual enrollments, and with a single exception no platoon schools are included in the averages]

[1] In some cities kindergartners teach only half a day and in others a full day.
[2] Special schools and classes include atypical or subnormal, open air, opportunity, deaf, blind, ungraded, incorrigible, speech correction, sight conservation, etc.
[3] In addition to regular classroom teachers this includes teachers of special subjects (manual training, music, physical training, etc.), coaching or tutor teachers, and research and visiting teachers.
[4] Average of 35.5 includes both platoon and nonplatoon schools.

The Bureau of Efficiency reports that Washington compares very favorably in the elementary schools with the situation in other cities.

The Bureau of Efficiency report that—in comparison with other cities Washington has a disproportionately large number of kindergarten teachers.

That there are—an average of one and three-quarters kindergartners per kindergarten. With one exception, each of the 84 kindergartners with enrollments of 30 or more had 2 kindergartners, and 5 kindergartens with less than 30 enrolled had 2 kindergartners each.

The United States Bureau of Education reports that there is not another city in the United States of population of 100,000 or more that makes as liberal provision for kindergartens as does Washington. Doctor Ballou stated, page 496 of the hearings on the bill, that they "could handle the situation" regarding the transfer of the 15 surplus kindergarten teachers to grade work. On page 448 of the hearings Doctor Cramer testified that with "sufficient time" they could make the shrinkage in the kindergarten teachers. So that there should be no dispute about a reduction in the 15 teachers on that score. The Bureau of Efficiency reports that—at the present time Washington compares favorably with other cities of the United States with respect to the load of its regular elementary school teachers.

No serious complaint was made to the committee about the teacher situation in the elementary schools.

The Bureau of Efficiency and the committee have given exhaustive study to the "special-subject" teachers. They report that the special teacher is to teach the teacher, and that the director is to direct the teacher of the teacher that teaches the children. They state that during the last 10 years there has been an increase of over 50 per cent in special teachers, while the average enrollment has increased but 9 per cent. That many of the grade teachers are just as well qualified to teach the special subjects as the special teachers themselves; that the present system is unsatisfactory, results in a "duplication of teacher service and a loss of instructional space"; and recommend that—the itinerant teacher should eventually be replaced by a much smaller number of assistants to directors who will serve as inspectors and instructors of special subjects in the same way that the assistants in primary instruction now serve for regular subjects.

Doctor Ballou stated that he agreed with that recommendation "100 per cent." The Bureau of Efficiency stated that the 79 itinerant teachers in physical education, music, drawing, and nature study, could eventually be reduced to 24, or by a total number of 55. We were then confronted with "when?" After full discussion with the school officials over two or three days, Doctor Ballou agreed that they could absorb into the regular classroom-teaching staff a "dozen or fifteen" of these teachers without "materially jeopardizing" that work, and that they would report back next year the results. The regular-grade teacher teaches these subjects 80 per cent of the time and therefore the effectiveness of the teaching depends on the knowledge and skill of the grade teacher.

It is agreed then, that the request for 40 elementary teachers can be reduced one at Conduit Road and four at Langdon, leaving 35 asked for. It is further agreed that 15 kindergarten and 12 to 15 itinerant teachers can be absorbed into the system, making a total of 27 to 30 to deduct from the 35 requested. Accordingly, the committee allowed 10 teachers instead of the five or eight that these figures show would be sufficient. If a mistake is being made it is being made on the side of liberality to the schools.

You will find in the hearings a very exhaustive report on the platoon schools. The committee believe that that system should be given a complete tryout here. The school officials agree. There is one platoon school in Washington—Park View; however it is not fully equipped for platoon work and is overcrowded. The parents at that school are almost unanimous in its favor. We have directed the municipal architect and the school officials to study the present plant and to submit to us next year a complete study of that school, the buildings necessary to make it a complete platoon unit, and so forth. If the report next year is satisfactory, it is our plan to develop at the Park View School a complete platoon school. We can then study first hand, the financial and educational effect of the system.

Regarding the junior high schools, the Bureau of Efficiency submits a table which you will find in the hearings showing that in 1925–26 the average number of pupils per teacher in Washington was 19.5, that 11 other cities had a greater average with St. Louis at the top with 27.8 and Baltimore 26.3. Likewise they submit a table showing that the pupil load per teacher in the senior high school here in 1925–26 was 20.3. That 20 other cities in the United States had a greater pupil load per teacher than Washington. Seattle, Wash., heads the list with 27.2. They find an excess of teachers in some subjects of the junior high schools and a "small excess of teachers in nearly all subjects in the senior high schools."

Last year we refused the schools 74 additional teachers. This report justifies our action. It also shows that Washington is now very adequately supplied with teachers.

Much has been said about the need for school buildings—great scare headlines appear at regular intervals in the papers about it. I spoke the other day on that and will not repeat what I then said—save to again call the attention of the House to the testimony of Doctor Ballou that the "most urgent" need in the schools was not to provide more classrooms in this year's bill, but to provide money for a site for a junior high school in southwest Washington. Accordingly, we have provided in this bill $250,000 above the Budget figures for the purpose of school sites. We expect to hold a conference with the school officials regarding the organization of the schools and in particular the business administration. Accordingly, we denied the request for four statisticians, pending the outcome of such a conference.

Much propaganda is being fed to the people of Washington about the condition of the portable schools. The 75 portables in use have a total seating capacity of 2,720. There are 75,063 seats now in the District schools. When the building program now under way and carried in this bill is completed there will be a total of 80,337 seats. There are not to exceed 70,000 children in the schools. So the total portable use is comparatively small. The school officials should be able to do away with them entirely when the present program is fully carried out. Many could be closed now if Maryland and Virginia children were taken out of the schools of Washington. The bill carries a proviso in effect that the present nonresident children in the schools may remain, but that hereafter no more may enter the schools here. This is in lieu of a tuition charge. The cost to the District now to give free education to Maryland and Virginia is $223,000 a year. One new school building could be built each year if Maryland and Virginia paid tuition. They do not. In justice to the District taxpayer and the District children the present situation should be brought to an end. The committee's proposal will cause no hardship on anyone. The children now in the schools may remain. But from now on Maryland and Virginia must take care of the increase and new students. Under this bill their school can easily meet this requirement. No harm will be done anyone and justice will be done the District.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Are not nearly all those children the children of employees of the National Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no way of knowing that accurately. But they are paying taxes in your State, and your

State is taxing the people of the State to educate them. Instead of doing that, those children are being educated at the expense, in part, of the Government employees in the District. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] pointed out the other day, the Government employee in the District of Columbia is being taxed not only to educate his own children, but those of District employees who live in Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I know; but most of them are children of Government officials employed in the departments or in the Army and Navy, and they are just as much a part of the National Government as those children whose parents are themselves living in the District of Columbia. Besides that, I want to say to the gentleman that Maryland pays far more into the National Treasury than she receives out of it in any form.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not talking now about the National Treasury. We should recognize the fact that the District treasury is a distinct entity from the Federal Treasury, and any plea that you are paying taxes to the Federal Government ought not to enter into this situation at all. [Applause.]

One District employee, living not in your State, but in Virginia, reported this to the committee. He is one of the men you talked about the other day as a low-salaried Federal employee who has to live in an outlying section. He does live there, and he is compelled to send his children to a school that may not be up to the standard of the Washington schools, and why? Because he can not afford to bring his children into Washington. Those people say they want to compel Maryland and Virginia to take care of their own school children. Now, the rich man, who can hire a chauffeur or pay the car fare to send his children to the Washington schools, does so, and the result is that instead of helping the poor Federal employee who lives in your State you are harming him. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Maryland is not trying to take any small position in this matter. The District is quite small compared with our State, and yet the highways of our State are open to the people of Washington at all times.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and all the streets of Washington and the streets of every city and State in the Union are open to the cars of Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; but those who work in the various camps and military reservations throughout the country are admitted by the States to their schools as a rule.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not by the State of Maryland. I have a letter in my file from the wife of a man employed at Camp Perry, in which she says their children are required to pay tuition in the schools.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have seen bus loads of children coming to attend county schools. I know that they do not pay any tuition and have not been asked to pay any. They were from Camp Meade, now Fort Leonard Wood.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a letter from the mother of a child living at Camp Perry, and she asks the question: "So long as I am required to pay tuition for the education of my boy at that school, why should not Maryland pay when she sends her children to the schools of the District of Columbia?"

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIFFORD. I fully appreciate the report that the gentleman has made, and I therefore hesitate to make any criticism. In his attempt to separate the Federal tax rate from the city tax rate I hope the gentleman will not forget that some of us still think that the Federal contribution entitles one who works for the Government to send his children to school in Washington, whether he lives in or just outside the city. This is a part of the appropriation bill that for four or five years has been intensely interesting to me for many reasons.

If this city, 10 miles square, has gotten to be so beautiful and rich and property has become so valuable that we learn our Government employees now have to go outside the city limits to find a place to live, I think it hard practice for us to refuse their children admission to the Washington schools. It is rather a serious proposition, coming from the Committee on Appropriations after due deliberation, and I can not but feel a little disturbed about it. I want the chairman to consider whether our poorly paid employees who have to go outside to find a home should not have the privilege of educating their children here—the most highly prized privilege which could be granted to them?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not believe a child who belongs to a Member of Congress has any more right to enter the District schools than the child of anyone else living outside the city of Washington. If a Member of Congress elects to live in Maryland or in Virginia, whether he owns property or pays rent there or not, his taxes go to that community, and that community ought, under all the rules and methods followed in the United States, either to attend the schools of that place or to pay tuition somewhere else. I would like to see legislation passed in the District to charge tuition. But here is the District of Columbia complaining about bearing a tax burden, complaining about the conditions in the schools, and we have to-day 2,500 Maryland and Virginia schoolchildren attending schools in the District whom the District is educating at a cost of almost a quarter of a million dollars, for which they do not pay one cent of the cost.

You overlook the statement I made to the gentleman from Maryland, and that is this: That the rich man who has gone out into Maryland and Virginia brings his child in an automobile to a District school. The clerk in the District government may not do that; he can not afford to do that; he sometimes can not even afford to pay car fare. He must take what Maryland and Virginia give him. The result is that the man who ought to pay a part of the cost of the education of those children is getting out from under the cost.

Mr. GIFFORD. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I fully understood the proposition.

As I understand, the recommendation of the bill is that those children who are now in the District schools from Maryland and Virginia shall continue to come to these schools, if they desire to come; but that hereafter those States may not send children to the District schools even though they may be willing to pay tuition?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not say that the schools of Washington are better than those of Maryland and Virginia, but I do say that our employees of the Government should have the privilege of sending their children to school here if they are willing to pay a certain amount for tuition; and I certainly object when that privilege is not accorded them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that the gentleman attend prayerfully before the District legislative committee and ask that committee to hold hearings and report out two tuition bills now pending before that committee—one bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]. If that were done, we could handle this thing as it should be handled; but a Maryland Congressman [Mr. ZIHLMAN] is at the head of that legislative committee and no tuition bill has come or will come, in my judgment, out of that committee. The reason why we are letting the children remain who are now in the District schools is to meet a situation that was brought up two years ago, and that is that if we shut the doors of the schools completely at once these outlying districts might not be able to take care of their children at once. We do not want to deprive a child of the right of going to school. Neither do we want to take out of the District school those children who have been attending them for some time. In some instances a child has been in a certain school and under certain teachers for quite a while; some of the children have come up through the schools here and may be half through or more. We do not want to shut the doors against them all at once and not permit them to finish their course here. Therefore we are not going to shut the doors to those children, but we are saying to Maryland and Virginia, if this bill is adopted, that hereafter they will have to take care of their own children.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that I well remember the discussion we have already had upon this measure. I remember we have defeated the measure thus far, but I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not necessary for a number of employees of the Government to find homes outside of the District because of conditions here—real-estate men taking possession of the beautiful city of Washington and putting almost unheard-of valuations on property? Of course, we know these employees must find homes and move outside if there are no homes within the city limits, such as they could afford. I would ask the gentleman to deny that the necessity exists for employees of the Government to find homes outside of the city limits.

Mr. SIMMONS. I deny that. I have put in the RECORD a statement showing that Washington has more area within the District than other cities of its size have. There is area enough here. Two years ago we had a delegation come to us from Chevy Chase complaining about the deplorable conditions of that school. The spokesmen of that delegation were Maryland citizens, and they asked us to build schools in the District of Columbia for their benefit. The territory in Chevy Chase, I take it, is not a poor man's country. You take Takoma Park: Two years ago they had a new school with two rooms standing idle, when the Takoma Park, D. C., school had better than half of its classes coming from across the line in Maryland. About two weeks ago one of the Washington newspapers referred to the deplorable condition in the District schools and carried pictures of the portables at Takoma Park, D. C. They pictured the fine school building in Maryland. If Maryland will take its children out of the Takoma Park, D. C., school, we can shut the portables there to-morrow morning, and if they will take their children out of the E. V. Brown School, we can close those portables to-morrow morning.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEYER. As I understand, the children now in the Washington schools from outside States will have the privilege of remaining there, but from now on children from Maryland and Virginia will not be permitted to come to Washington schools?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What are you doing to bring that about?

Mr. SIMMONS. In the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. A proviso is carried that hereafter no part of the money carried in the bill for teachers can be used to educate children who do not dwell in the District except those enrolled in the schools at the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is, of course, by way of a limitation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; and it is only made necessary by the fact that we are unable to get a fair tuition bill before the House.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If that goes through in the way suggested by the gentleman, will pupils from Virginia and Maryland be permitted to attend schools in the District if they pay tuition?

Mr. SIMMONS. They will not, because there is no law authorizing the payment of tuition.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They will be excluded?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAMTON. It all emphasizes how unfair it is for the District Committee to refuse to bring out a legislative bill on this subject and let the House express its views with reference to it, because there are parliamentary complications in connection with an appropriation bill that do not permit provision for all the angles in connection with this question of payment of tuition. I will say that for two or three years I have tried to get such a bill out of that committee but without success.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman, when he speaks about the schools of Maryland and Virginia, of course, I am not familiar with Virginia schools.

But I do know that the schools of Maryland are first class and stand among the highest in this country. The truth of the matter is Washington is growing so fast and rentals here in the city are so high that the people who have lived here and who work in the Army or the Navy or in the various departments of government are going into Maryland where they get cheaper rents. The counties can not keep up with this growth. They can not erect the buildings fast enough. They have a building program now by which they are trying to provide for them, but the population of the Government is growing so fast and the people are moving into these counties so fast that Maryland can not keep up with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why do you have a low tax rate?

Mr. LINTHICUM. We have not a low tax rate. Our tax rate is high all over the State.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Especially our tax rate for schools.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no. You are now getting into trouble with the Board of Trade of Washington.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is not very hard to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. They charge that the Washington tax rate is comparable with the other cities of the country; one-third of this bill goes to the support of the schools of Washington, or $1 out of every $3 is for that purpose. If your people paid proper taxes you could have the schools; and I will say this to the credit of Maryland and Virginia: During the past two years they have built schools bordering Washington and we have 500 less nonresident pupils in the District schools than we had when we had this matter before the House two years ago.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But if you put your provision through you shut down on us peremptorily.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; do not make that statement, because we are not doing that. Under the provisions of this bill we are willing to take through the Washington schools, without charging you a cent for it, every child you have in the schools now, but we are asking you from now on to take care of your own children, as the District taxpayer is compelled to take care of his children.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman has not already made the statement, will he tell us about how many children come in from Virginia and Maryland, and how the number is divided between the two States?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be glad to give the gentleman that information. There is a complete statement of that in the hearings. Virginia has been doing a very good job of building schools lately.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Virginia is building excellent schoolhouses in the territory in question here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the gentleman from Virginia will remember that when I first came here five years ago I asked where in Virginia I could find a place to live near a school that had a kindergarten, and they told me to go to Richmond. [Laughter.] Since then the condition has very much improved and we can go into Virginia opposite Washington and find kindergartens and other good schools.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. While the information is being looked up——

Mr. HOLADAY. I can give the gentleman the information. From Virginia there are 538 in the day schools, 22 in the night schools, and 60 in the vocation schools.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And from Maryland?

Mr. HOLADAY. From Maryland, 1,736 in the day schools, 31 in the night schools, and 184 in the vocation schools.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My friend will bear in mind, of course, that involved in his proposal are the Army officers who are located within the area accessible to Washington for school purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We have Fort Myer, we have the Marine Corps camp at Quantico, and we have the Engineers' School at Humphreys. The policy proposed by this bill would operate to exclude, after a little while, the children of the officers who are serving at those posts.

Mr. SIMMONS. I take it the same arrangements can be made to educate the increment there as elsewhere. That is the conclusion the committee reached. Of course, if the gentleman wants to offer as an additional proviso an amendment exempting those children, well and good.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I should say that probably quite a large percentage of the 500 or 600 is represented by the children from those particular localities, although I have not made any analysis to determine that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be very pleased to have that information by Thursday. I have not it now.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLADAY. With reference to the assertion of the gentleman from Maryland as to the quality of the schools in the State of Maryland, I had some correspondence with the superintendent of schools of Montgomery County, Md., which is an adjoining county, with reference to lending them some of these portable buildings to be moved over into Maryland, and he states:

> I feel confident that they will be glad to accept a number of these buildings [referring to the portable buildings] for use in the sections of our county where smaller buildings of the general type similar to the portable buildings of the one and two room schools are in use. We should be glad to have any estimate you have available as to the cost of moving a two-room portable school building over a distance of 20 or 25 miles.

Evidently the superintendent thinks the portable schools that are now in use and which are so seriously objected to by the Washington papers are better than the buildings now in use in the interior of Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is not a fair conclusion. [Laughter and applause.] I want to say to the gentleman we have splendid school buildings throughout our State and in every section of our State, but you are pressing us so hard with more children that I presume they are willing to take some of these temporary buildings; and I want to say further that I guess a good many men on this floor did not go to school in a building as fine as some of these temporary buildings in Washington. I know I did not for a great many years. These temporary buildings are very good buildings when properly constructed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman now permit me to use some of my time and ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the gentleman is making the statement that the portables we are using in Washington are perfectly fine school buildings?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am not; but I think they are a whole lot better than nothing and a whole lot better than we had in various sections of this country many years ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. The proposal of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], is that Congress authorize the moving of these portables over into Maryland. In other words, to give them the buildings, just move them across, pay the expense of moving, and then all they will have to do is to hire the teachers and send their own children to the schools in the fine State of Maryland, which the gentleman represents.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not speak for Montgomery County, as I am from Baltimore City; but I may state——

Mr. SIMMONS. Assuming that Washington would be willing to give you the portables, will you take them and your children?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I may say to the gentleman that at one time I taught school in Frederick County, Md., and I know that that county has very fine school buildings throughout the county, and so has Montgomery County, but there are some locations where they need small buildings.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is true, then I think it would be well for the Maryland children to go to school in the fine schools of that State, and that is what the committee wants to make it possible for them to do.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understand that is what the committee is trying to make possible, but the committee ought to consider the fact that these children are mostly children of Government employees, and the Government is paying $9,000,000 or more toward the support of the District of Columbia.

As to the use of the public highways, we are glad that you do use them, for we want you to see the beauties of our State, but when it comes to educating a few children the District of Columbia makes complaint.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman will pardon me if I call to his attention the fact that two years ago Congress levied a gas tax in Washington because Maryland did not want us to use her fine highways unless we did it.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I notice in the bill on page 46 the provision about which the chairman of the committee has been talking, and they use the language, in excluding children from the schools, "pupils who dwell outside the District of Columbia." I would like to ask the gentleman what his interpretation of the word "dwell" is?

Mr. SIMMONS. Dwell means where they live as distinguished from legal residence. In other words, if a child has its fireside and home outside of the District he is excluded.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. If that is the interpretation, children whose parents are residents of other States but who dwell here would not be excluded?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. My legal residence is in Nebraska; my citizenship is there; but while my service keeps me in Washington my children are also here, within the District, where I dwell during this time.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. In view of that interpretation, the gentleman does not think that his children would be excluded from the schools in Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. If I dwelled, as I once did, in Maryland, I would have no right to bring my children into the District of Columbia schools.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I want to suggest that it seems to me that the word ought to be further explained. I recall that "dwell" means a fixed habitation.

Mr. SIMMONS. This word was taken on the definition given in the Corpus Juris. "Dwell," in the opinion of the committee, is a proper word to describe what we want to do, to wit: To allow all the children who actually live in the District to go to school without the payment of tuition, although their home, their legal residence, may be outside of the District in the States.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I looked the definition of "dwell" up in Webster's Dictionary, and it defines it as a fixed habitation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will refer the gentleman to the definition in the Corpus Juris.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will.

Mr. HOLADAY. The provision in the bill calls for the withdrawal of the children of Maryland from the District schools in the next 12 years. I want to read an extract from the letter that I received from the Montgomery County superintendent. It is as follows:

We believe that within a reasonable period of years the country-school plants could accommodate all county children, but should the District schools be quickly closed to our children, we estimate that they would be inconvenienced to about the extent of the figures of this estimate.

So that I do not see that there is much difference between the Maryland authorities and this bill. They say they can do it in a reasonable time, and we give them 12 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, there is one thing further I want to allude to, and that is an item that the bill does not carry—$350,000 which was requested for building a nurses' home at Columbia Hospital. The committee did not include that in the bill, and if you will read the hearings you will find the reasons. We think our action will meet the approval of the friends of that institution.

Briefly, the situation is this: The United States owns the ground on which the hospital is located. The District of Columbia and the United States jointly built the building. It was built by the United States and later on one-half of it was charged to the District. The hospital authorities claim that it is a private institution. They are in a public building, yet they ask for the maintenance of that building, and we are furnishing heat, light, and water every year. We pay in the hospital the same price for charity patients as we do elsewhere. They have an average of 50 pay patients in the hospital all the time. They are gradually running behind; they can not pay their way. We have had it up in public and private hearings with the officials of the hospital; we hope in the future—between now and next year—that we can work out a solution of the present unsatisfactory condition in Columbia Hospital.

Briefly stated, they feel that they are entitled to the building, that it should be given to them. There is a question of their legal and equitable right in the building and there is a question in respect to the obligation of the Government as to them and the obligation they have to the Government. Under that unsatisfactory and unsettled condition we did not think it was fair to the taxpayer of the District, nor was it good business, to go ahead and build at public expense a nurses' home for that institution. So that that item is one of the larger items that is out of the bill.

I think that with that exception that I have covered generally the more important items in the bill. Later on when the bill is read under the five-minute rule if there is any information desired that we have not given this morning I shall be glad to supply it. I do again want to call to the attention of the people of the District the opinion of the subcommittee that if they want their tax rates in the city of Washington held down or reduced the way to do it is to insist on an economical, businesslike, efficient administration of city affairs, and cut out of these bills that constantly come to us, just as this committee has done this year, those items that are not properly chargeable to city finances and that are not necessary in the city's government. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the chairman of the subcommittee should give serious consideration, as well as the superintendent of schools and the Department of Education generally, to the idea of a junior college within the District of Columbia. I think the average departmental worker with children labors under a fearful worry, not only financially but mentally, because of the thought that there is no place within the District of Columbia no such school as one could be called a university where he can send his children for at least two years after they graduate from the high schools. It seems to me that we could do nothing better for the children of the departmental workers than to have erected in the District of Columbia a junior college, which would take care of the first two years of college work. I notice that several of the States are now taking up that matter, with the idea of preventing the great mass of students going into the universities and colleges during the first two years, when many of them drop out, sending them to junior colleges instead within the State.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. In every university in the United States the gentleman will find earnest, deserving students who are working their way through college. You do not have to call on the Government of the United States to prepare everything so easy and so rosy for the ambitious students of the United States; that is, for the ones who have anything to them. They do not ask our Government to furnish their tuition for them free. You have universities right here in Washington, splendid universities, and you have the Maryland University right near, in all of which students may work their own way, and the tuition is not high where they have to pay. Any student in Washington can go to them, and by making some effort on his own part can thus make of himself a more useful citizen by helping to defray his own expenses.

Mr. ARENTZ. I do not know whether it is due to the brains of the parents or to the peculiar condition of the times, but it is a fact that children are graduated from the high schools now at 15 and 16 years of age.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, in my own university days you could not enter the State University of Texas until you were 16 years of age, and there were numerous boys and girls then who had to wait over a year after high-school graduation before they could get in the university. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], I understand, graduated from Harvard when only 19 years of age. It is not so different now from the days gone by in that respect.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee has given some study to that question. The question of a junior college in my opinion is one that should come from the legislative committee and not be initiated by our committee. I do not believe that the Washington universities offer to the student who must go on his own resources the opportunities that the various State universities do.

Mr. ARENTZ. They certainly do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. For instance, the cost of tuition at the George Washington University for a full year's course is something over $200. If you ask the student to earn that first and then on top of that to earn his expenses as he goes along, you are placing a greater burden on him than is placed on students in many of the universities of the country. The only educational system in the District paid for by the District above the twelfth grade is for two normal schools.

The course of study in those two schools has been so arranged that it has been absolutely impossible for the girl who desires to qualify herself as a teacher and work her way through school, as we say, to go to those schools. Two years ago we called it to the attention of the school officials; last year we again called it to the attention of the school officials, as we did again this year. In the present system of the normal schools, with two years of education above the high schools, at public expense, the only students coming in are those who come from the homes of well-to-do parents. We have asked the school officials to change their course of education so that a girl could go to those schools and qualify as a teacher, possibly for a longer period than three years, and work her way through. We have been promised that next year we will have a course of study in those schools that will at least give that small opening to the people of the District.

I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in rising at this time is to say that for something over 10 years I have made a study of District matters, fiscal and otherwise, and I am frank to say that this bill and the report that is now before the House are based upon a more thorough and efficient study of District matters than any bill that has come before the House heretofore. It is the result of the unusually able efforts of the entire committee. Particularly the remarkably clear, able, and convincing statement that has just been presented to the House, and especially that part with reference to fiscal matters, contains more information than has ever been presented to this House before by any Representative in charge of that bill. [Applause.]

I think the chairman and the committee are entitled to the thanks of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks, and to print in the RECORD certain tables to which I shall refer in these brief remarks, and which I shall use as the basis for the discussion of certain questions that are likely to come up when we reach the stage of the five-minute consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen—I am looking around to see if any of our ladies are present, and not seeing any, I shall simply greet you with the salutation of "Mr. Chairman and gentlemen."

I am glad that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] paid that splendid tribute to the chairman of our subcommittee. I want to join with him in expressing my personal appreciation of his courtesy and his uniform fairness and to pay a tribute to the splendid ability he displayed as presiding officer in the hearings on this, which is one of the most important bills that comes before this House. I want also to express my appreciation of the labors of my colleagues upon the subcommittee, Mr. HOLADAY, of Illinois, and Mr. WELSH and Mr. CASEY, both of Pennsylvania. All together, without, I hope, laying myself open to the suspicion of self-laudation, I think that this is about the best subcommittee on District appropriations under the Committee on Appropriations that we have ever had since this method of handling appropriations was inaugurated. [Applause.]

The committee gave earnest, sincere, and consecutive attention to every question that came up. They labored valiantly to be honest, to be fair, to be just; and I think the people of the District can congratulate themselves that they have had a board of aldermen in this subcommittee who, even if they may be called stepfathers, have turned out for their benefit one of the best bills that has ever been presented in Congress.

This bill has several outstanding features. I think perhaps the most important, the most widely interesting feature of this bill, although up to this moment it has not been stressed either in debate or in the public print, is that part of the bill which increases the appropriation for the payment of salaries for District employees by over $121,000. That feature of the bill is referred to on page 5 of the report. It provides for the step-up of the salaries of District employees. Remember, it is not a voluntary raise in salary, coming from the heart of the members of the committee; there is nothing gratuitous about it; it is simply the exercise of fairness and justice in putting into operation the specific mandatory provisions of section 7 of the classification act. That section provides that the salaries of employees shall be raised every year, providing they maintain a certain degree of efficiency, so as to "step up" the employees of the District of Columbia automatically and consecutively, to enable them to draw a salary corresponding to their proper grades.

Witness what has been taking place for years! It is no wonder that the employees of the District have felt discouraged. Major Donovan, of the auditor's bureau, testified before our committee that out of 1,950 employees affected there are 1,043 who still draw the minimum salaries.

Next above that there are 348 employees drawing the minimum salary. In the next step above that there are 233 employees drawing the salaries they are entitled to under the law, while there are only 206 employees out of 1,950 clerks in the District who are drawing the average of their grade. There are only 128 employees in the District who are drawing above the average of their grade. There are none of the 1,950 employees in this class subject to this section of the classification act who are receiving the maximum pay required by a faithful observance of the law.

How did this change come about? How is it that for the first time this subcommittee has given consideration to the plight of these employees? I want here and now to pay my meed of respect and honor to the man who, more than all others, is responsible for that change in the method of handling appropriations—my friend from Pennsylvania here [Mr. CASEY]. [Applause.]

He was not content to sit in the committee and listen to gab which led nowhere. He was not content to learn about these things and then say, "Ah, we will attend to this next year"; but he drove right home to the point. I ask you to read from the hearings if you are interested—that is, anybody who is interested—from pages 43 and 44 of the hearings. Mr. Donovan stated that if this committee should provide $170,000 in 1929 for promotions based on efficiency ratings it would probably give every employee entitled to promotion such promotion, but the amounts of money carried in this bill for promotions is less than $40,000, so that only one out of every four will receive a promotion.

Mr. CASEY. To which, under the law, they were entitled.

Mr. DONOVAN. The law provides—section 7 of the classification act—that employees shall be entitled—shall be entitled—to promotion to the salary next above their present salary, upon the attainment and maintenance of the appropriate efficiency rating, provided that Congress has appropriated sufficient money for paying the promotions. There is where the trouble comes, the employees get the required efficiency ratings, but the funds have not been appropriated to give the promotions.

Mr. CASEY. Why do you only ask for $35,000 or $40,000, when you ought to have $200,000 to comply with the law?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOGG). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Casey, that brings up the question of the action by the Budget Bureau on the commissioners' estimates. If you wish me to go into that—you know we are under Executive injunction not to propose appropriations not in the Budget——

Mr. CASEY. I know, but I am a member of this committee and want information; when I ask a question I want a reply to it. I am not bound by the President's injunction or the Bureau of the Budget's injunction. I appreciate your position, and the record shows you are trying to protect yourself and I am trying to do my duty.

Mr. DONOVAN. Eliminating the schools, police and fire departments, and confining an answer solely to the employees affected by the classification act it would require $163,920 to give each employee a step-up; that is, each employee drawing less than the average salary of the grade.

And so on, until it culminated in the action of the committee in devoting $121,000 to this function of providing step-ups for the employees in the District.

I saw something in the paper the other day from an officer of one of the employees' organization from which I judged he was preparing to assume credit for this voluntary action on the part of the committee, but I want it known publicly that it was not due to any appeal, pressure, or urging on the part of any organization whatever, but was due primarily to the initiation and the insistence of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

I hope when the District officials proceed to allocate this increase of the appropriation for this year they will not take half the men who are entitled to the step-up, as has been intimated, but that they will allocate it to all of those who are entitled to a step-up, and distribute the fund granted this year so that everyone entitled to a step-up shall get his pro rata share out of this appropriation. I hope I make myself clear on that point, and I hope that in the allocation of the fund the District officials will see that everybody gets what he is entitled to.

Mr. CASEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Before the gentleman leaves that point it may be well for him to explain for the RECORD that the understanding of the committee and the District officials is that this money must be allocated to the people who are at the minimum of their grades before they allocate any of it to those above the minimum of the grades. It is to take care of the poor fellows who have not gotten increases.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That was the understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. Further than that, when that is done, the preference is to go to the fellow who is drawing the least salary of the two.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. There are many features in this bill, and I hope you will not be overawed by these papers before me. I do not intend by any means to discuss every phase of the bill. I could not do it. There is such a demand for time that I do not want to take up the time myself, but I have asked leave to extend my remarks in order that I may be able to put in the RECORD certain constructive suggestions in connection with the District government.

Whenever District matters come up in this House, in the House of the stepfathers of the District, the attendance immediately dwindles. You can not talk statistics, you can not give figures, you can not make any appeal whatever and hold the crowd. If I could only have gotten up a row with our genial chairman, I think we would have had a full attendance, but he was too good and too genial to indulge in any provocation and everything passed off very pleasantly.

The virtue of membership on an appropriation committee is this, that it gives a man who is serious-minded an opportunity to look at the inside of things, to study the machinery of municipal government and find out how the thing works. I would count my time lost on this committee—all the days and weeks that we have devoted to this bill—if I did not derive certain opinions and arrive at certain convictions as to the right or wrong of things and in what particulars something might be done to alleviate existing conditions; because notwithstanding all the taffy we may sling on the subject there is something rotten in Denmark. I have become more confirmed in my conviction that the best government given by the stepfathers in Congress is not as good as the worst government the people of the District would be able to give themselves, and I am going to elaborate on that in the future and suggest something constructive.

Mr. CASEY. In other words, as I understand the gentleman, the people would rather have self-government than good government?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think so. At least, that is the way they feel about it. Now, there is a phase of the Federal and District condemnation law that I would like to take the time to enlarge upon, but I am not going to do it here. However, I am going to make what I hope will prove to be some constructive suggestions on the subject. I am also going to make some constructive suggestions on the matter of the retirement and pension laws of the District. It is a rather odd thing that in this little principality, in this little Territory of the District of Columbia, we have three distinct, separate, and uncoordinated pension and retirement laws affecting the employees of the District. They differ not only in the amounts of contribution that the employees make to the fund, but they differ also in the benefits derived from the fund. For instance, briefly, as to the contributions. The school-teachers contribute out of their annual salary up to 8 per cent on a maximum salary of $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes. The policemen and firemen contribute 2½ per cent of their annual salary while the civil-service clerks, the most poorly paid of all, contribute 3½ per cent of their annual salary.

In the matter of pensions, the school-teachers receive 1 per cent of the average annual salary for 10 years immediately preceding retirement multiplied by the number of years of their service, plus the Government contribution of $15 for each year of service up to 40 years.

Policemen and firemen, not more than 50 per cent of salary at the time of retirement. Upon the death of a member, before or after retirement, his widow receives $60 a month during widowhood, and each child under 16 years of age $10 a month. Seventy-five dollars is paid from the fund toward funeral expenses of a member dying while in the service.

The widows of policemen and firemen receive this pension, but the widows of school-teachers and civil-service clerks receive nothing.

As to the amount of refund; for school-teachers, all the contributions of the teacher compounded annually are returned upon separation from the service. In the case of policemen and firemen, the law does not authorize a refund of their contributions to the fund, although they may be retired from the service without any fault of their own. As to civil-service clerks, all contributions of employees plus 4 per cent interest, compounded annually, as in the case of school-teachers, are returned upon their separation from the service.

In my opinion the pension laws affecting the employees of the District ought to be uniform. They ought to be coordinated, they ought to be fair and give a square deal to all without distinction as to class or condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman has been very kind in the fine floral wreathes that have been thrown toward the chairman of the subcommittee, but I think the committee will understand that if there is any credit due for the preparation of this bill, it is not due to any one member, but to the entire committee, and may I suggest, also, for the benefit of the gentleman from New York, the committee is made up of one Englishmen, one Scotsman, and three Irishmen, and that probably accounts for the fine way in which we get along. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. In other words, in a sense, you are getting a little touch of Tammany here in Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the legislation providing for the retirement and pensioning of District employees is embraced in several distinct acts, bearing no relation to one another, and providing separate and uncoordinated schemes of contributions and benefits.

It appears to me that there is no reason in the world why the retirement and pension laws of the District should not be uniform; at least there seems to be no justification for the confusion, the conflict, and the inequalities that now exist.

In my opinion no class of employees are entitled to special favors, and none should be discriminated against. If there is any public policy involved—as I believe there is—in safeguarding the old age of faithful employees and protecting their widows and orphans from want, the law governing the subject should be uniform and applicable in all its features to all classes of employees alike.

I herewith append a summary of the main provisions of the existing laws and a table, prepared by the auditor of the District, Maj. A. J. Donovan, a very capable and experienced man, whose services are of inestimable benefit, not only to the District itself but to Members of Congress who have come to rely implicitly upon his vast stores of information on every phase of local government:

1. SCHOOL-TEACHERS

The act relating to the retirement of school-teachers was approved June 11, 1926, and is entitled "An act for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia, etc.," approved January 15, 1920 (44 Stat. 727).

2. POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN

The act relating to policemen and firemen is section 12 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved September 1, 1916 (39 Stat. 718).

3. CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

The retirement of civilian employees in the Federal service in the District of Columbia and in the service of the District of Columbia is controlled by the act of Congress approved May 22, 1920, as amended by the act of July 3, 1926.

The provisions of these three distinct methods of retirement are visually displayed in the following chart prepared by the auditor, and disclose at a glance the inequalities and lack of coordination in the three retirement laws:

1. As to contribution of the employee; as to contribution of the District.

2. As to benefits received: Widows and children of police and firemen receive pensions; the others do not.

3. As to refunds: Teachers and civil-service employees (clerks) receive a refund of the amounts paid in upon their separation from the service; police and firemen do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, on the 15th of this month there took place at Arlington Cemetery and at Fort Myer the annual anniversary observance of the sinking of the battleship Maine in Habana Harbor. On this occasion an address was delivered by Dr. Rafael R. Altunaga, counselor of the Cuban embassy and chargé d'affaires, that was as beautiful in the poetry of its language as it was searching in the truth of its thoughts. It had a particular meaning this year, because there was in convention at Habana at the time a meeting of the representatives of the various States of the Western Hemisphere in the Pan American conference.

It will be fitting, indeed, to have placed in the RECORD the speech delivered by the Cuban chargé at that time, and I ask unanimous consent that as a part of my remarks there may be included the brief letter with which this address was transmitted to me and the address of Doctor Altunaga.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOOPER). The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1928.

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Dr. Rafael Rodríguez Altunaga, counselor of the Cuban embassy and chargé d'affaires ad interim, delivered an address at the Maine memorial exercises held February 15, 1928, in the riding hall at Fort Myer, Va., under the auspices of the Department of the District of Columbia, United Spanish War Veterans, that was keenly appreciated, as demonstrated by the frequent applause of the veterans of the Spanish War, the large audience of public officials, distinguished guests, and citizens present, comprising more than 2,000 people. The program was also broadcasted by the National Broadcasting Co. over its red network.

The splendid tribute paid by Doctor Altunaga to the heroic men who lost their lives in the sinking of the Maine cemented still closer the firm bond of friendship that exists between Cuba and the United States.

The address is worthy of the attention of Senators and Representatives and other public men. * * *

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MAYNARD,
Past Department Commander United Spanish War Veterans.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY DR. RAFAEL RODRÍGUEZ ALTUNAGA, COUNSELOR OF THE CUBAN EMBASSY AND CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES AD INTERIM, AT FORT MYER, VA., FEBRUARY 15, 1928, THE THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SINKING OF THE BATTLESHIP "MAINE"

Once again the Cuban nation comes, through its diplomatic representative in Washington, to place, as in a votive lamp, the myrrh of its gratitude in this love offering which the veterans of the Spanish-American War are paying to-day in tribute to the never-to-be-forgotten victims of the Maine. To-day, as on other occasions, we feel the same warm devotion for those who perished that unfortunate night in February of 1898 in Habana Harbor in a horrible catastrophe, the remembrance of which, even after 30 years, terrifies one's mind.

The contemplation of a monument to the dead fills the soul with an almost religious sentiment. Man looks on such a marker as a milepost on the road to the great mystery; and the heart recoils before the prospect of mute eternity. This sentiment is increased when with the idea of death is associated the memory of the country's tragedy for the cause of its liberty; and on so viewing it there seems to drift the shadows of those who gave their lives as a tribute to that liberty. The heart beats more strongly then, the eyes dim from emotion, and the soul is prostrated before these august shadows which are like guardians and an intangible guaranty of integrity of a free nation. So, when Cubans visit the solemn monument raised to the Maine in Arlington National Cemetery, we experience this strange emotion which I have analyzed before, and we recall that loyal and sincere friendship of Cuba and the United States. This respect which exists in this Nation for the liberty and integrity of the Republic of Cuba is so sacred it is far removed from the avarice of man, because it is a treasure the custody of which is held by those who embraced immortality on the wings of fire on the tragic night of February 15, 1898; and also by those who at Santiago de Cuba, with its holocaust shortly afterwards, wrote the epilogue of 50 years to Cuba's struggle for emancipation.

The tragedy of one minute ended a tragedy of half a century. Since 1850 the Cuban Nation practically maintained armed rebellion against the intolerable policies of its bad rulers. And I say the policies of its bad rulers because the battle for our liberty was not a battle of race against race, nor of hate and reciprocal rancor. The war waged was not against the Spaniards, for the Spaniards are our own parents. To more strongly accentuate this affirmation the father and mother of Martí, the soul of the revolution, were Spaniards; and, in truth, our nationality is and always will be Spanish in so far as the work of centuries does not develop a new social order or blot out ancestral inheritances. The Cuban revolution was the result of the culture of the Cuban nation, of its thinkers, of its poets, and writers who were not resigned, as the men of the Spanish America of 1810 and 1811 were not resigned, to the scorn of the ruling classes. Through the shadows of the colonial government there filtered the civilization of the world, and the legion of martyrs and apostles of the revolution was formed, and soldiers were spiritually recruited to achieve that work. Blessed be the man who prefers to embrace the cross as a martyr than live in the world as a slave.

In this unequal fight for liberty of one against one hundred, in America we always found an asylum of consolation, a protecting hand, a voice of cheer. Here thousands of my compatriots took up their residence; here many of them founded their homes; here they lived, dreaming of their return to a land enlightened by the sun of democracy and liberty. Wealth, peace, and courage; love for science and for art, the generous blood of youth; all these were brought as a pledge of devotion and faith to the immense pyre built before the image of the tortured country. Nothing restrained the Cubans in their romantic battle for life with dignity or death with honor, and as high ideals of justice, which, like the arbors in the moral harmony of the world, are at the end fulfilled, Providence, invisible mother of men, put its finger into the labyrinth of our destiny and showed its face amidst the veils of a tragic night.

The thunder of the explosion of the Maine roared; the waters of bitterness, thrown day by day and year by year into the hearts of the American people, overflowed in uncontrollable torrents and crowds inflamed in the streets of American cities were changed into instruments of our vengeance and shouted to the high powers of the Nation: "Remember the Maine" and "Viva Cuba libre."

Thus, the liberty of Cuba has remained forever united with the memory of that inexpressible catastrophe. The apathy and diplomacy of the American Government gave place to the exultant march of the armies, full of ideals, which were on the way to consummate a work which, in the quadrant of the history of the American continent, had remained a century behind. Santiago de Cuba, the hill of San Juan, and Caney are holy shrines for the patriotic sentiments of two nations which found themselves together amid the clamor of the battle and facing death under the same ideals.

If it were possible in our time to revive the biblical legend of the sanctity of the tabernacle there could be nothing better than to declare a holy place this zone of Santiago where—rare secret of history—was begun and finished the Spanish dominion over Cuba. A millenary stone, as an ark of the covenant, would mark the culminating point where the sacrifice of Cubans and Americans was the greatest, and on this stone should appear, arm in arm, facing the image of death, the Cuban and American soldiers and, lighting the scene, a rising sun, from which disk, as drops of light, should be suspended this sentence, taken from the joint resolution of the American Congress: "Cuba is, and by right ought to be, free and independent." That place would be closed to the Cubans and Americans who would not go there in patriotic pilgrimage with hearts as pure and unselfish as those who fell in that place; with minds void of any paltry desire; in mystic elation; evoking for their spirits; and in the lips the tremor of a prayer. The high points of history remain inaccessible to those who do not feel themselves with courage to ascend the mystic path which leads to immortality and to glory. Sic itur ad astra.

Spanish-American War Veterans, your responsibility is very great. You must maintain, like a sacred fire, and hand down to posterity the aspirations which stimulated your companions and for which they sacrificed their lives on the battle fields of Cuba. The Hand which created the world made us physically neighbors, as though preparing the mutual intelligence and the fraternal ties which unite us to-day, while high ideals and historical facts place us arm in arm and heart with heart.

The dead, from the valley of eternity, are contemplating us and in silence are watching each step we take in this labor of mutual understanding, reciprocal and sincere confidence and profound respect for our common traditions which are the reasons for this ceremony of pious reverence which gathers us together here to-day.

The best way, the only one, of honoring the dead is to be loyal to the spirit in which they lived. It is not enough to erect monuments, to sing De Profundis, and to utter panegyrics. It is necessary to feel deeply the ideal to which they sacrificed themselves. Any other act is a profanation.

Victims of the Maine! Cubans will eternally glorify your names because above them is written the liberty of Cuba.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the Members of the House H. R. 11199, a bill to provide for the furnishing of bonds by national and State banks and trust companies which are members of the Federal reserve system for the protection of depositors. H. R. 11199 is a revised, amended copy of H. R. 5572.

Section 1 requires that all banks, State and national, and trust companies, members of the Federal reserve system, shall each give bond in the sum of 25 per cent of the amount of their deposits, exclusive of interest-bearing time deposits and other deposits specially secured, for the protection of the general unsecured depositors.

Congress, of course, does not have jurisdiction over State banks and trust companies which are not members of the Federal reserve system, and therefore the provisions of the bill are not attempted to be made to apply to them. The banks and trust companies affected are given six months to comply with the provisions of the act and to give the bonds as required therein.

Section 2 requires that all national banks, upon their organization, shall each give bond in an amount equal to its capital stock at the time of organization, and thereafter a bond in the sum of 25 per cent of the deposits shall be given, as shown by its last annual statement.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to approve such bond upon ascertaining that the surety company making the bond is financially responsible.

Section 4 requires a report of all banks affected on January 1 of each year showing their total aggregate deposits subject to check, interest-bearing time deposits, and deposits otherwise specially secured.

The provisions of this bill only require a bond in an amount equal to 25 per cent of the amount of unsecured deposits and does not require a bond for interest-bearing deposits placed with the bank under special contract and does not cover deposits such as county, State, school, and municipal, which are otherwise specially secured. The bond is for the purpose of guaranteeing security of the general deposits of the banks which are not otherwise secured.

It may be asked why it is provided in the bill that a bond of only 25 per cent of the aggregate amount of deposits is required. Of the failed banks brought to my attention if 25 per cent of the deposits had been guaranteed and this percentage of the deposits had been paid in cash by a surety company, as this bill would require, I know of no bank that would have failed. In the event it is found, however, that 25 per cent would not be a sufficient amount to protect all depositors, this percentage could and should be increased.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports for the year 1927, in his annual report (p. 17), as follows:

> The average percentage of dividends paid on claims proved against the 706 receiverships that have been finally closed was 74.74 per cent. Had offsets, loans paid, and other disbursements been included in this calculation the disbursements to creditors would show an average of 80.95 per cent.

This shows that a bond of 25 per cent would in all but extraordinary cases be sufficient to cover the loss and pay the depositors in full. If experience should show, however, that a larger percentage is required, the bill could be amended and the percentage increased. It should be large enough to guarantee all depositors against loss.

It may be inquired as to the necessity for this legislation. Let the statistics as shown by the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency answer this. The report of the comptroller for 1927, page 13, shows that there were 7,832 national banking associations in existence at the close of the current year, October 31, 1927, with a capital of $1,502,697,615, and, page 101, on June 30, 1927, there were 27,061 reporting banking associations in the continental United States, Alaska, and insular possessions, with combined resources aggregating $68,132,558,000. This amount includes individual deposits of $51,132,554,000. The comptroller reports, in answer to my inquiry under date of January 21, 1928, that for the eight years beginning January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1927, inclusive, there were 564 national bank failures with deposits aggregating a total of $213,546,400, and that there were 3,377 failures of other banking associations, State banks, and trust companies with aggregate deposits of $971,956,704.

I am appending two tables prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency, the first showing, by States, the number of national banking institutions which failed for each year from 1920 to 1927, inclusive, showing capital and deposits, and the second table showing State bank and trust company failures during the period reported upon by States and by years.

From the figures given in these two tables we have prepared the following table showing by States: (1) The total number of State-bank failures, (2) total amount of failed State-bank deposits, (3) total number of national-bank failures, (4) total amount of failed national-bank deposits, (5) total number of both State and national bank failures, (6) total amount of deposits of failed banks, State and national, (7) the grand total number of failed banks, State and national, and (8) the grand total of deposits of failed banks, both State and national, for the eight-year period covered by the two tables:

These figures compel an earnest study of the subject and to my mind conclusively show the necessity for this legislation.

Of the 3,941 bank failures during the period of eight years reported upon, 2,818, or a little more than two-thirds, were from 12 States, and an examination of the deposits shows that they were $726,365,778, about two-thirds of the $1,185,503,104 aggregate total deposits of all failed banks. Beginning with the State having the greatest number of bank failures during the period reported upon, Iowa heads the list with 367 failed banks, with deposits aggregating $142,777,255. Following, in their order, are the 12 States referred to:

State	Failures	Amount
Iowa	367	$142,777,255
North Dakota	364	68,351,348
Minnesota	299	81,181,817
South Dakota	293	83,796,332
Georgia	253	39,630,662
Oklahoma	209	45,356,270

South Carolina	158	48,315,233
Nebraska	152	36,789,409
Kansas	148	37,131,636
Total	2,818	726,365,778

Surely, when it is shown by official tables that 3,941 banks failed in the past eight years, with aggregate total deposits of $1,185,503,104, this is all that should be necessary to emphasize the necessity for legislation such as I have proposed.

The comptroller reports (p. 15) that 135 national banks, the largest number during the eight years reported in the table, with an aggregate capital of $8,257,000, were placed in charge of receivers during the year ending October 31, 1927, and that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927 (p. 19), there were 689 failures of State and private banks, with total liabilities of $206,655,000, as compared with 496 failures of this class of banks the year previous, with liabilities aggregating $147,823,000, or an increase of 193 State-bank failures for the year ending June 30, 1927, over the previous year.

Congressman HOWARD, of Nebraska, stated in a speech a few days ago that his State had a guaranty law, and that since it was enacted no depositor had lost a dollar. This is a splendid record. The law of that State requires a contribution from each bank to a fund to insure the deposits of all banks. The bill I have introduced would require each bank to give bond to insure its own deposits. I have not investigated the history of such legislation to find out how many States have enacted laws requiring bank deposits to be guaranteed. If the Federal Government had led the way and each State had enacted such a law it would not only have saved the percentage of loss to depositors on the $1,185,503,104, but it would also have saved the capital stock of the failed national banks, aggregating $34,979,500, and the surplus of each, and the capital stock and surplus of each of the State banks which failed during the past eight years, aggregating perhaps more than $100,000,000. I do not have exact figures as to amount of capital and surplus of the failed State banks.

Every bank, State and national, which receives school, county, city, and State deposits, is required to give a surety bond in an amount equal to the total of these deposits. This is true, regardless of the financial standing of the bank. If a bank is required to give a bond to protect school, county, city, and State deposits, why should it not be required, in a reasonable amount, to insure individual deposits against loss? I see no difference in principle. In the State of Oklahoma all Indian funds deposited with any bank, no matter how strong the bank, are required to be secured, either by a surety bond or by the deposit of approved securities in an amount equal to the deposits.

For my part I see no difference in requiring a bond in a sufficient amount to protect the laborer, the washerwoman, farmer, business and professional man, and all classes who are depositors against loss. There can be no legitimate argument against the principle involved in this bill. The only argument I have heard urged against it is that the premium on the bond would be an additional expense to the bank. Of course, that is true; but banks are required to pay premiums on the bonds given to secure school, county, city, and State funds. This bill would not only be a good thing for the depositors but it would be a good thing for the shareholders of the banks. It would result in the executive officers of the banks being more conservative, they would require better security for loans, and their assets would be kept in more liquid form, for they would be subject not only to the supervision and criticism of the bank examiners but also of the representatives of the surety companies making the bonds for the banks. This would, therefore, in my judgment, prevent many banks from failing and would save large amounts to the shareholders in assessments where banks fail, and result in larger dividends being paid to the stockholders of the banks. The average dividend paid by national banks on capital and surplus for 1927 was 6.62 per cent.

Again, the active officers of the banks are required to give bond to protect the bank against loss on their account, notwithstanding they may be and are men and women of high character. Why is this required? If this be true as to individuals, why, on principle, should not the depositors be protected against loss by requiring the banks to give bond?

Congress passed the Federal reserve act in December, 1913. It provided a financial reservoir to which member banks might go for assistance, and it has been successful since the organization of the Federal reserve banks in 1914. The failures of banks have been due to a number of causes, and among them are: Too many banks were organized in some communities, some banks were in charge of inexperienced officers, and some failures have been due to economic conditions. Failures in the South and Middle West have been largely due to agricultural conditions, and in the far West and in the Southwest to the losses on cattle, and, of course, a few failures have been due to corrupt management. I think by far the most failures can be attributed to economic conditions, and I think this is conclusively shown by the figures which I have given as to the number of failed banks in the 12 agricultural States, where two-thirds of the bank failures occurred. The second cause, in my judgment, is due to inexperienced management.

This bill in a way tends to guard against this, because surety companies would be reluctant to make bonds for banks which are not managed by experienced officers.

It is urged by some that it would be difficult for some banks to give such a bond. They make bonds to secure State, county, school, and municipal funds. Why can not they make bonds to secure general depositors? If a bank is in such a precarious condition that reputable surety companies would not make a bond for it, then the sooner that bank is liquidated the better, and the less will be the loss to the depositors, the shareholders, and the people of the community.

It has been suggested that surety bonds are not required to insure the deposits of State banks, and that therefore this would be a discrimination against the banks mentioned in the bill. I think it would have the contrary effect, because I believe that it would result in State legislation requiring every State bank to take out insurance for the benefit of its depositors. As between two banks, one conservatively managed with a surety bond to protect the depositors and the other without such a bond, everyone knows, of course, that the majority of the people would deposit their money in the bank protecting their money by a surety bond. The premium on the bonds required under this bill, in my judgment, would be small as compared with the profit on the increased deposits which the bank would receive, and therefore this bill would be financially beneficial to all the banks throughout the country. It would bring every dollar out of hiding and could be used for the productive development of the community. I think deposits in every bank throughout the country would increase. It certainly would make the officers of the banks more conservative and result in fewer bad loans and therefore would result in a greater financial advantage to the shareholders in increased dividends; it would protect the depositors against loss and would clearly be in their interest.

This bill does not require one bank to insure the deposits of another. Every bank under this bill would pay for the premium on its own bond. No bank would be dependent upon another bank. I think this is the only sound principle. If banks were required to contribute to a guaranty fund for the benefit of all banks, then the strong, conservative, well-managed banks would contribute to the weak banks and those in the hands of inexperienced officers. The amount of the premium would depend upon the condition and management of each bank. If safe, officered by experienced men, and conservatively managed, the premium would be small. The same principle would be applied as in the case of fire insurance. The greater the hazard the larger the premium. As in the case of fire insurance, when the hazard—bad flues and fire traps—is removed, which in banking is comparable to reckless, inexperienced management, and unsecured loans, the premium will be reduced. Every bank whose condition entitles it to be bonded can find a surety company seeking its business and anxious to make its bond. Let me emphasize: I have no doubt but that it would result in increased deposits for each bank, and therefore increased profits, far in excess of the small amount of premium required to be paid on the bond. Again it would establish confidence in banks throughout the country and bring out of hiding large amounts of money not now deposited in banks. I believe this is a good bill from every standpoint. I believe it right in principle and I want to urge it upon the earnest consideration of the Members of the House. I have pressed it upon the attention of individuals and bankers throughout the country, and no objection has ever been urged against it other than the objection of the cost of the premium on the bond. If every State in the Union, by legislation, requires that its public officials must require such bonds to insure public deposits in banks, why should not the individual depositors be so secured? What is the difference in principle?

The loss to depositors does not present the full picture. They have not only lost their entire savings but many of them have no credit elsewhere and are left penniless and destitute. Some have to sacrifice what little property they have to meet obligations they expected to pay out of the money lost or to meet current expenses. Not one anticipated the loss and made no provision for it. Everyone in the community feels the financial shock. Business is paralyzed. Everyone, whether a depositor or not, sustains a loss through business depression. It takes months, sometimes years, for the public to regain confidence. The shareholders are assessed. They must sacrifice their property at a ruinous loss to raise the money. Why? There is but one answer, and that is because we decline to compel the banks to incur the extra expense of a small premium on the surety bonds which this bill would require. If enacted into law, it would protect the depositors, the shareholders, and the public from the business depression that always follows a bank failure. Let me repeat the question: Why are banks required by Federal and State laws and regulations to make bonds to secure public money? The answer is, to guarantee it. We should not permit the small premium which the banks would have to pay to outweigh in this legislation the rights of the depositors and the interest of the public. Banks are chartered under legislative sanction, State and Federal. We can not and should not try to longer escape our responsibility.

During my entire life I have exerted my best efforts to assist in the protection of the men and women of small means who did not possess financial strength or who were not organized to fight his or her own battle, and I am forced to the conclusion that every bank and trust company which is required to furnish a bond to secure school, county, city, and State funds, and also Indian funds, should also be required to make a bond to fully protect the general depositors who have confidence in the banking institutions conducted and protected by the laws of the Federal Government. [Applause.]

The two tables referred to in my remarks, together with the correspondence with the Comptroller of the Currency, are, by the permission of the House, hereto appended:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1928.

Hon. J. W. McINTOSH,
Comptroller of the Currency, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCINTOSH: In re H. R. 5572, to provide for the furnishing of bonds by National and State banks and trust companies which are members of the Federal reserve system for the protection of depositors.

For use before the committee in the matter of the above bill, which I have introduced, I would appreciate it if you would furnish me with the number of bank failures, State and Federal, from January 1, 1920, to January 1, 1928. Also the amount of the capital stock and the deposits of each class of banks and the location of the banks by States.

This bill only requires deposits to be protected by national banks and trust companies and State banks and trust companies which are members of the Federal reserve system, for the reason that Congress has no jurisdiction over a State bank not a member of this system.

So far as I know, every State, including Oklahoma, requires a surety bond or the deposit of approved Federal or State bonds to secure all public deposits, such as county, municipal, school, and Indian deposits, and I see no difference in principle in requiring such protection for individual deposits.

I want to use this data to show the losses that have been sustained through bank failures during the past eight years, therefore would appreciate it if you would give me these figures by years as well as by States. If you do not have the data with reference to State banks, please direct me to the place where I may secure this information.

Very respectfully,

W. W. HASTINGS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 21, 1928.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Complying with the request in your communication of the 9th instant, I have had compiled and inclose herewith statement showing, by States, the number of national banks which have failed, together with their capital and deposits, each year, from January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1927, inclusive.

Information concerning failures of banks other than national is furnished this office through the courtesy of the various State bank superintendents, but for only the fiscal years, and the data received does not disclose the amount of capital or deposits. I inclose, however, a consolidated statement compiled from the annual reports of the comptroller, showing by States the number and liabilities of failures of State and private banks during the eight fiscal years ended June 30, 1920, to 1927, inclusive, which are the latest figures available.

Yours very truly,

J. W. MCINTOSH, Comptroller.

National-bank failures, January 1, 1920–December 31, 1927, inclusive

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, my reason for addressing the House at this time is to offer a very brief and certainly incomplete explanation of what can be designated as the present day naval program in this country. It is not my intention or expectation to offer any suggestions to those either in Congress or in official life who are entrusted with the duties and decisions concerning the necessary equipment for a navy such as citizens of this country may wish to have maintained. My sole reason for speaking at this time is the fact that there seems to have been a very much misconceived and misunderstood view of the position of the administration. There has resulted from this misunderstanding a nation-wide propaganda of opposition to the program. Probably there is no Member of this House who has not been deluged with scores of letters and telegrams protesting against what is understood to be a proposed increase of great proportions in the size of our Navy.

The recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, which were made to the House Committee on Naval Affairs January 11, 1928, have been so thoroughly discussed that there seems to be no reason for again bringing up the details of those recommendations. Even if referred to, a Member who is not conversant with naval technicalities and not informed as to the details of the suggestions could not with intelligence discuss such a problem. It is, therefore, my desire to deal with the subject only as an outsider and to explain in a few words how one Member of Congress at least regards the present status of the case, particularly with reference to the complaints and protests that have been made to Members of Congress by constituents.

For a complete understanding of the attitude of the administration and a realization that the program is one of peace rather than of war or aggrandizement, it is desirable for us to recall certain events of a few years ago.

First, let me refer to the results of the Limitation of Armaments Conference held in Washington in the winter of 1921–22. The agreement then reached applied to battleship reduction and in conformity with its terms this country scrapped nearly 825,000 tons, greatly in excess of the quantity scrapped by any other country. No agreement was reached at that conference with respect to auxiliary vessels, upon which it was expected that action would follow after the program relative to battleships had been carried into effect by the signatory countries. The latter result having been accomplished, the President requested the nations concerned to meet in Geneva last summer for the purpose of considering the program further. Instead of carrying the program forward with regard to cruisers, one of the nations participating even went so far as to suggest an increase of 50 per cent in its cruiser strength. The records show that even without this increase there was a very large disparity between the cruiser tonnage of the United States and the other power rated equally with us on the 5–5–3 basis at the Washington conference. Inability to reach an agreement on this point was one of the principal reasons for the failure of the conference at Geneva.

When the subject of naval construction was before Congress last year the President opposed any increase in cruiser tonnage in order that the Geneva conference could take up the subject before we acted. This attitude and other things showed that the President is sincerely in favor of reduction rather than increase of naval armament. Another indication of the administration's position was the approval by the Secretary of State of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FROTHINGHAM] to the effect that submarine construction should be abandoned. Secretary Kellogg, however, made his approval contingent upon other nations also agreeing to the same principle. According to cable dispatches, marked opposition to this program immediately developed in foreign countries. In other words, they have flatly refused to agree not to construct submarines.

Let us see exactly what President Coolidge recommended in his annual message to Congress last December. After referring to the national defense by suggesting a moderate military force, the President next referred to the Navy, and the following are extracts from his references to the naval situation:

> Our Navy is likewise a weapon of defense. We have a foreign commerce and ocean lines of trade unsurpassed by any other country. We have outlying territory in the two great oceans and long stretches of seacoast studded with the richest cities in the world. We are responsible for the protection of a large population and the greatest treasure ever bestowed upon any people. We are charged with an international duty of defending the Panama Canal. To meet these responsibilities we need a very substantial sea armament. * * * We can plan for the future and begin a moderate building program.
> This country has put away the Old World policy of competitive armaments. It can never be relieved of the responsibility of adequate national defense. We have one treaty secured by an unprecedented attitude of generosity on our part for a limitation in naval armament. After most careful preparation, extending over months, we recently made every effort to secure a three-power treaty to the same end. * * * We are ready and willing to continue the preparatory investigations on the general subject of limitation of armaments which have been started under the auspices of the League of Nations.
> * * * Any future treaty of limitation will call on us for more ships. We should enter on no competition. We should refrain from no needful program. * * * But it should be made known to all that our military power holds no threat of aggrandizement. It is a guaranty of peace and security at home, and when it goes abroad it is an instrument for the protection of the legal rights of our citizens under international law, a refuge in time of disorder, and always the servant of world peace. Wherever our flag goes the rights of humanity increase.

In conclusion he says, among other things:

> It is the policy of the United States to promote peace. We are a peaceful people and committed to the settling of disputes by amicable adjustment rather than by force. We have believed that peace can best be secured by a faithful observance on our part of the principles of international law, accompanied by patience and conciliation, and requiring of others a like treatment for ourselves.

It is fair to say that the details of the administration's naval program came in the nature of a surprise to the people of the country. The first impression they gained was of a sudden desire upon its part for an extensive new Navy program. What struck the people forcibly was the enormous amount of money involved. To say that we were to spend $750,000,000 for naval construction carried the idea that this sum was to be immediately available and would come out of the pockets of the taxpayers at once.

As a matter of fact the program was intended in an orderly manner to maintain our naval defense in accordance with the standards established by the Washington conference. Even if the program is carried into effect the cost will be spread over a period of eight years. Therefore the annual expense will be not in excess of $92,000,000 or $93,000,000. In addition to providing new equipment, all of which is designated, the replacement of obsolete and worn-out material is a very large and, in fact, the major item of the program.

Congress is made up, as it rightly should be, of men of all types and viewpoints. Practically all our legislation is the result of compromise. It is fair to assume that whatever naval program is ultimately adopted by Congress will be the result of an effort to bring into agreement the divergent views of the congressional membership. We can confidently expect, therefore, that the bill as finally passed will call for a smaller appropriation and less construction than that recommended by the President, although carrying out in the main the general principles he has laid down.

The most recent development is a press statement to the effect that the President has changed his mind as to the need of as much equipment as he originally recommended. This, I infer, is incorrect, in that he has simply been a little more specific and seems to have stated, in effect, that the most pressing need for first construction are the 25 cruisers. However, a misconception has arisen to the effect that he has now limited his recommendation to this cruiser construction. The facts do not seem to bear out this idea, although, of course, I know nothing about what the President may have said either to individuals or to the representatives of the press.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Can the gentleman tell us what happened between the time of the President's message to the Sixty-ninth Congress, when he said we had a Navy equal to any in the world, and the time when the Secretary of the Navy submitted his great naval program?

Mr. TREADWAY. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I was not speaking from any technical information as to the needs of the Navy or the existing conditions. I admit absolute ignorance; it is not in my line of work. I am trying to demonstrate that we are not aiming at war preparation, but that the intent of the administration is to put us on a partial parity with other nations that will help toward world peace.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman means that it is competition of parity?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; if the gentleman will ask gentlemen who are informed of the parity between nations, he will find that we are nowhere near a parity, and never were, either in men, battleships, or cruisers. Nor have we been on a parity in the possibility of equipping merchant ships.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman think we ought to be on a parity?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will tell the gentleman at the conclusion of my remarks exactly what my position is, if he will permit. I have not the knowledge that would permit a discussion of these details. I am trying to draw a general picture, and particularly the subject of my remarks is caused by what I conceive to have been very erroneous and misconceived propaganda that has gone around the country. Undoubtedly the gentleman has had as many letters and telegrams, as many as the rest of us, on the subject.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman has given me information that I have been wanting to have. I did not understand the cost of the vessels that we scrapped.

Mr. TREADWAY. We scrapped 825,000 tons as the result of the international agreement for the limitation of armament.

Mr. STEVENSON. And how much was the cost of those vessels?

Mr. TREADWAY. I can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. And we are expected to turn around and build $700,000,000 worth of new vessels?

Mr. TREADWAY. The naval program calls, over a period of eight years rather than to-day or to-morrow, for an expenditure of about $725,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will that put us on a parity?

Mr. TREADWAY. The dollar-and-cents proposition has not come into my mind at all. Here is the situation: The countries sent delegates here and we framed a program of limitation of armament. It applied to battleships—we must get that into our minds. Understand, it applied only to battleships. When Secretary Hughes—and probably the gentleman was present—made that thrilling, wonderful address he mapped out a program which this country carried out in all details. That program, while it applied only to battleships, was intended later to include other naval construction, which has not been done.

Mr. STEVENSON. They framed us instead of framing the program. Now we are going to spend $750,000,000 to get even?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; the gentleman would not put the honor and the integrity of the country, as agreed upon by the representatives at the Washington conference, against any number of millions of dollars. We are a country honest and upright, and stand by our word, and our word was given to scrap those battleships.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not intimated or insinuated anything against the honor of the country. I say we were overreached.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not know how the gentleman defines "overreached." We carried out the agreement, and there was no more able, no more prominent member of that delegation on the part of this country than the distinguished Senator Underwood of the gentleman's own party.

Mr. BLACK of New York. That is probably the reason why we have any Navy left at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think Mr. Underwood would take any more credit than the other members. They were under the leadership of Secretary Hughes, and any man who listened to his address at the opening of the conference knows that the interests of the United States were in mighty good hands.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] was not here then.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to say that if I am any judge of deep thinking and ability to express one's self Secretary Hughes exhibited that quality in the address to which I refer. [Applause.]

Last year I voted with the President against increased naval armament, feeling, as he did, that we should await the results of the Geneva conference. The fact that that conference failed puts an entirely different aspect on the whole proposition. Whatever the individual view of the President may be, or the opinions of the people of this country, we must all recognize that we have gotten into a position of internationalism and are, to a certain degree, a creature of the nations of the world. If our views are not accepted by other nations, whether we wish it or not we are practically forced to keep up with whatever programs they may set up. All this brings to mind our total unpreparedness at the beginning of the World War, both on land and on sea. If at that time we had had suitable naval equipment, no merchant ships flying the American flag would have been attacked and sunk by Germany. We need only to be reminded of conditions at that time to realize our duty to our country to-day.

President Coolidge, in my opinion, is advocating this naval program in the firm belief that it is the duty of this country to maintain its standards of parity in some degree with other nations, not in anticipation of war, but as a means of maintaining peace. In this viewpoint I heartily concur and am prepared to support a measure based upon proper defense of the country and the maintenance of peace both at home and abroad. Such a bill will be reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs which has devoted extensive study to the situation and it will represent its judgment as to the equipment necessary to maintain our position among the nations of the world. In this way only can we ultimately become the leaders of the peace of the world. [Applause.]

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9136) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June and July, 1928, and providing for an appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the expenses of the delegates.

The committee resumed its session.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Linthicum].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I arise to discuss that section of the bill which appertains to students of the public schools who dwell outside the District of Columbia, to wit:

On page 46, public schools:

> No part of the appropriation herein made for the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be used for the instruction of pupils who dwell outside the District of Columbia: Provided, That this limitation shall not apply to pupils who are enrolled in the schools of the District of Columbia on the date of the approval of this act.

I feel quite sure that appropriation committee for the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia residents are anxious and willing to be fair and equitable as to these students of Maryland and Virginia, who seek an education in the splendid schools of Washington. We must not overlook the fact that the city of Washington has in the past decade grown from a city of perhaps 300,000 to one to-day of 528,000. This very large increase began during the World War when people from all over the country came to Washington and went into the Government service, and thousands of them have remained. Since the World War began this vast increase of population has caused increased values of real estate and extremely high rentals, so high indeed that Congress had to intervene to protect the interests of the citizens. What naturally followed was for these Government employees receiving small salaries from $1,200 to $1,500 or perhaps $1,800 or more, with families to raise, looked beyond the confines of the District and discovered homes both large and small in Montgomery and Prince Georges Counties of Maryland and Arlington County, Va. There they could obtain a small cottage or bungalow at a reasonable purchase price, and where rentals are much lower than in the District. There they found some vacant ground, healthful surroundings, and a place very suitable for the rearing of their families at much less than it would cost in the District of Columbia.

The result has been that these counties have been overburdened from an educational standpoint with this large influx of population. They have likewise been largely overburdened financially. You will observe from the table which I here insert what it costs to educate a child:

Statement of tuition cost of nonresident pupils attending public schools, District of Columbia

Type of school	Tuition rate	Total enrollment	Total cost of tuition	Total paying tuition	Total estimated revenues	Total not paying
Normal	$183.67	19	$3,489.73	2	$367.34	17
Senior high	131.13	796	104,379.48	33	4,327.29	763
Junior high	116.44	290	33,767.60	5	582.20	285
Elementary	67.24	1,163	78,200.12	16	1,075.84	1,147
Special	137.17	2	274.34			2
Vocational	153.17	15	2,297.55	1	153.17	14
Vacation	3.94	244	961.36			244
Night	9.74	53	516.22			53
Total		2,582	223,886.40	57	6,505.84	2,525

NOTE.—It takes $67.24 a year to educate a child in the elementary schools, $116.44 in the junior high and $131.13 in the senior high.

Now, for example, take a family with two children in the elementary school. It would cost the county about $134.48 to educate these two children per year, whereas the county, if it is a small bungalow or cottage, is perhaps only receiving some $60 or $70 as a total tax from this family. If the family happens to have one child in the senior high, it would cost the county $131.13 to educate this child, while perhaps the county is only getting the $60 or $70 taxes all told. Advance this idea to larger families and ask yourself whether the county should not also receive sympathy.

You see, therefore, it is not only a question of the District being treated fairly, but it is likewise a question of your desire to treat these counties fair. These children, under the present law, must be the children of parents who are engaged in Government business, such as the children of Army and Navy officials, and the various departments of the Government, all of them brought to Washington or its environs for governmental service. Why, then, should not the National Government be willing to bear the burden of the children of its employees? Why should it desire to compel these counties only moderately well off financially to assume the whole expense? I verily believe that as this Government of ours increases in years to come a very considerable proportion of the population will be found in these counties surrounding the District. As transportation improves and greater distances can be covered in a short time, it is quite natural that Government employees and those wishing God's sunshine and climate will resort to the open spaces.

These counties have already begun to work out the problem, and some 500 less nonresident students are attending the public schools in Washington. Two years ago there were over 3,000 students from Maryland and Virginia in the city of Washington. To-day there are only 2,285 who do not pay tuition. Furthermore, it must not be forgotten that the National Government contributes $9,000,000 toward the expenses of the District of Columbia. Why should not the expense of educating these children of the employees of the National Government, which amounts to $217,380.56, be paid out of this fund? Certainly, we should not adopt the provision proposed in this bill, which prevents all future students from coming into the District of Columbia until the counties which are bearing the burden have time to provide them education.

The gentleman preceding me, Mr. TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, has just been advocating the President's naval policy, which provides for the expenditure for each of the next eight years of $92,000,000, and yet the Appropriations Committee is depriving these children of the rights of an education when they are the people who are eventually to be the part of this great Nation and along with those from the various States of the country are to guide the old ship of state and are to utilize this vast Navy in the defense of our country in the years yet to come.

I hope Congress will not make the mistake of depriving any child of every educational advantage, and I assure you that the great free State of Maryland, as fast as it is able to do so, will provide the educational facilities for its children, though I am personally thoroughly convinced that it is the duty of the National Government to provide education for the children of its employees and not to depend upon the restricted facilities of the neighboring counties.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would prefer to go on with my statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just to have the gentleman develop this one thought: Does Maryland have a State school fund?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Of course, Maryland provides a State school fund.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that the State contributes to the counties in support of the schools?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The State contributes to the counties just like the National Government contributes, for instance, to the roads throughout the country, upon the very same principle. The gentleman used as an argument the putting on of a gasoline tax in the District of Columbia to satisfy Maryland. The truth of it is that before you put the gasoline tax on here in the District you did not have a decent road leading out of the District into Maryland, but that since you put on that tax, and that fund goes to the building of District roads and streets, you have decent roads leading into the State of Maryland, where you have the advantage of all of our roads, which we invite you to use and enjoy and we are glad to have you, but be a little easy on the student question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] approaches this question in a fair way; he suggests on pages 297 and 298 of the hearings the following in the examination of Doctor Ballou by Mr. CASEY:

Mr. CASEY. Has this question ever been studied?

Doctor BALLOU. As to whether they could take care of their own children?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Doctor BALLOU. No; not on my part.

Mr. CASEY. Whose duty would it be to study it—the school authorities or the District Commissioners?

Doctor BALLOU. It would be the Maryland or Virginia authorities' business to study it, I should say.

Mr. CASEY. Do you think it would help any if we had a joint study made of it?

Doctor BALLOU. If the committee desire, I can make an inquiry of the superintendent of schools in Arlington County and also in the Maryland counties adjoining and find out from them what the situation is. I will be glad to do that if the committee so desires.

Mr. CASEY. I would rather see that done. I can readily see the injustice of this picture as it has been painted to us; but I can also see the other side of it. I do not want to deprive any child of an education when there are not facilities in his own State and I think the child should not be made to suffer because of lack of effort on somebody else's part. I think this matter should be looked into before we make the child pay the penalty.

Doctor BALLOU. I agree with that entirely.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman consent to have inserted in his remarks a letter from the superintendent of schools in the adjoining county of Virginia and a letter from the superintendent of schools in Montgomery County, Md., upon this very proposition?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not want any letters inserted in my remarks. Let the gentleman insert them in his own remarks. He has control of the time.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are letters which show that the committee, in the proposal that we have in the bill, has entirely met their wishes, to wit, that we do not force them to immediately take care of all of their children.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They would be rather enlightening in the further discussion of this question, if your statement is correct.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do.

Mr. CASEY. In view of what the chairman has just said, I wish to say that I have not seen those letters coming from the superintendent of schools in Maryland or Virginia.

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand they are from local county superintendents, and not from the superintendent of the public schools of the State of Maryland.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the gentleman claim that we ought to take care of all the children of Maryland and Virginia?

Mr. PALMISANO. No; I am referring particularly to that letter received from the superintendent of schools of Montgomery County.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded for this colloquy.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I wish the gentleman from Maryland would emphasize the fact that the public schools of the District of Columbia are not open to all the children of Maryland and Virginia but only to those children whose parents are engaged, officially or otherwise, in business in the District of Columbia, and who thereby contribute by their work and by their expenditures toward the taxes of this city.

I wish to emphasize the fact that this paragraph has been drawn with great skill and with a certain degree of artfulness, in that it is estimated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] and reported in the hearings on this bill that there are 224 children attending the public schools of the District of Columbia who are the children of Members of Congress or the children of the secretaries of Members of Congress, who get their tuition free. Not 10 per cent of the Members of Congress make any contribution whatever toward the taxes of the Government of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Can not the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will give you one more minute for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am sure the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL] does not wish to be misunderstood. There are, so far as we figure out, 224 children of Members of Congress or their clerks. Now, those who live in the District of Columbia are a considerable portion of those 224. They are either living in their own homes or renting quarters in parts of the District that are subject to taxes, so that they are not getting the education of their children free.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have only three minutes left.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Then we will try to get you more time. Does the gentleman from Nebraska mean to say that more than 10 per cent of the Members of Congress pay taxes here?

Mr. SIMMONS. If a man owns property he pays taxes on it; and if he rents, the landlord pays the tax, and that tax is reflected or passed on in the rent.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I should say that most of the Members of Congress live in Congress Hall.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The thing that I want to bring to your attention is the matter of fairness. Since the war the employees of the Government have increased by the thousands in the District of Columbia and the suburbs in Maryland, and that has been a heavy burden upon these two counties adjoining the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman from Nebraska give me a couple of minutes more?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That, as I have said, has been a heavy burden on these counties, and it costs in the education of the children where they have even one, and certainly where they have two children—it costs these counties, which are not rich counties, more than the counties get in total taxes out of the resident who lives in the county. The Government of the United States contributes $9,000,000 annually to the support of the government of the District of Columbia, and it costs about $217,380.56 annually to educate these children. You must remember, as my colleague from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL] has said, that they are the children of employees of this Government and not of the people who earn their livelihood by occupations carried on in those counties. All these children under the present law must be children of employees of the National Government, and the National Government contributes $9,000,000 annually to this fund.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are children of employees of the Government and otherwise occupied in the District. In other words, according to the testimony given two years ago, as I remember, if a farmer in Maryland delivers a quart of milk a day he is supposed to be in business here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Let us try to have the superintendents of education in the three counties and Doctor Ballou study this question and provide a system by which we can finally get rid of this annual argument over the education of a few children.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel that after all there is not so much difference between the District of Columbia and Maryland. The large percentage of the pupils from Maryland and Virginia come from the two adjoining counties. The superintendent of schools in both of those counties recognize that it is the duty of those counties, and of their respective States to furnish school facilities for the pupils residing in those counties. The only question is how soon they will be able to do that. Montgomery County, Md., and the adjoining county in Virginia, Arlington, are making rapid progress in that respect. They are constructing buildings. I think at the present time perhaps, or in not more than a year's time they will be able to take care of all of their high-school pupils, and in a few years all of their elementary pupils. As I say, they admit that in principle they should take care of those children, and the only question is how much time we will give them.

Mr. SIMMONS. The figures show that they are able to take care of 90 per cent of the high-school children, and about 50 per cent of the elementary-school children.

Mr. HOLADAY. I hope that in a few years they will be able to take care of all of their students. Under this provision we give them 12 years, because we provide that all pupils now in the District schools will have the right to continue through the next 11 years and complete their high-school education.

Long before the children who are now in the primary grades from Maryland and Virginia will have completed their school work, Maryland and Virginia will have the facilities to take care of their pupils. So after all the committee and the officials of the adjoining counties in Maryland and Virginia are practically in accord on the proposition.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL].

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had not anticipated that I would be required to make any remarks on this subject to-day, but the gentleman from Illinois has referred to something which is news to me, namely, that the school authorities of Prince Georges County and Montgomery County are in agreement with the authorities in the District of Columbia with regard to this provision in the appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLADAY. If the gentleman will permit, I did not refer to Prince Georges County, because I do not know that there is any communication from that superintendent. I referred to the superintendent of schools of Montgomery County, Md., and the superintendent of schools of Arlington County, Va. So far as I know we have no communication from the superintendent of schools of Prince Georges County.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to disabuse the minds of the members of this committee of the idea that Maryland is not trying to do its part in meeting this situation. I believe I may say without boastfulness that Maryland has made in recent years two notable contributions toward civic progress, in that she probably leads the Nation in the construction of good, modern, and improved roads, and has advanced from a low plane in educational advantages and facilities until she stands to-day in a notable position among the States of the Union.

You gentlemen must remember that the population of the city of Washington has increased enormously within the past 8 or 10 years and that a great influx of population has spread into Maryland along the District line, and has caused difficulties in the way of providing school facilities for those communities. Especially is that true when you bear in mind that ordinarily all school activities radiate from the county seats of the respective counties, and the county seats of Prince Georges and Montgomery Counties are some distance from the District line.

I have recently received a letter from the superintendent of the public schools of Prince Georges County, which gives some very interesting information. He says:

> There are 10,500 pupils enrolled in the public schools of Prince Georges County, and it is estimated that fully one-fourth of the pupils attending the public schools of Prince Georges County are the children of parents who work in Washington, and consequently pay their business tax directly or indirectly to that city.

And he might have added that most of those parents do their trading and buying in the city of Washington.

We have endeavored to meet this situation as best we can, and you gentlemen of the committee must have been struck with the significance of the statements made to you regarding the number of nonresident students attending the public schools of the District of Columbia this year as contrasted with those who attended the public schools two years ago. It was reported two years ago that there were about 3,072 nonresident pupils attending the public schools of the District of Columbia. To-day that number has been reduced to 2,582, of which about 57 students pay tuition. So that in two years there has been a reduction of about 500 nonresident students.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. GAMBRILL. We have endeavored to meet this situation, and in Prince Georges County alone, a county which is contiguous to the District of Columbia, I am informed by the superintendent of public schools of that county that they have built within the past five years 40 new school buildings which are being used at the present time.

I was very much in hopes that this matter might come up as a separate proposition and would be presented by the Cramton bill coming before this House, unrelated to an appropriation bill, so that the merits of this case might be discussed and that this question which has vexed Congress for some years might be decided.

When the paragraph in the appropriation bill which seeks to deprive the children of Maryland and Virginia of the privilege of attending the public schools of Washington comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule, I shall probably offer an amendment to that paragraph in the bill and will then take the opportunity of addressing the House on the subject. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD.]

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, the farm-relief problem is simple enough and only becomes difficult when we realize that there are not enough Members of Congress who are anxious to help the farmer. The farmer does not get a square deal anywhere. He gets anything but a square deal in taxation, marketing, production control, purchasing, and financing. Thousands of bills have been introduced for him, but not a single great law, such as has been enacted for other peoples, has been enacted for him.

I have studied most carefully every farm-relief plan submitted and find that many are not at all for the farmer but are introduced by those who come as wolves in sheep's clothing.

Let me write just one privilege for the farmer in any bill, and anyone can write all the rest of the bill, and I will support it, provided nothing is put in the bill to limit, restrict, or interfere with that one privilege written by me. I would give the farmer himself the one privilege enjoyed by all others of fixing a reasonable price for all he produces and sells. This can only be done when we enact laws giving the farmers the same rights enjoyed by other businesses and enterprises.

I have introduced several bills showing clearly how this can be done. For instance, my bill (H. R. 77) would enable the individual farmer to borrow the average amount for which his commodity has sold since January 1, 1917, and therefore his price would be stabilized at that average. The loan would enable him to hold his own cotton or other commodity for a fair price. In order to protect himself and all concerned he would agree to make such reasonable curtailments of production as is made by all others producing the particular commodity and as would enable him to get a fair price for his carry-over and for his new production.

The producers of each commodity would only be bound by their own expressed consent and then only such as actually sign the contract. By this plan the Government would be agreeing to help the farmers on a 50-50 plan, something on the order of that now in force with the States relative to road building. The Federal Government would offer to help the farmers become absolutely free to manage their own products and, as never before, to name and fix a price for the sale of their own commodities.

We would be offering to help the farmers, provided they would help themselves and become masters of their own fortunes. The farmers would handle their own commodities, receiving the highest reasonable prices for their products, with all the sale price going into their own pockets, and without deductions for fees, commissions, or other unnecessary so-called marketing charges.

The farmer's friends, not his enemies, would control his destinies and there would be no dangerous bureaucratic control of his rights. There would be only absolutely necessary governmental agencies with well-defined duties and powers. The bill is not in the interest of any organization, corporation, or syndicate, or any man or set of men other than the farmer, is drawn with his sole and only interest in view, and yet is not unfair to anyone.

The bill has a complete referendum and recall, and would not go into effect unless 75 per cent of the producers of the particular commodity so elected and would not remain in effect unless at least 75 per cent of such producers approved its continuance in operation.

In my humble judgment, the bill provides a complete solution of the overproduction problem, meets every reasonable objection to other farm relief bills, and without equalization fees, expensive machinery, or red tape puts the farmer on an absolute parity with those engaged in other industries or enterprises. It helps the farmer directly, not indirectly; makes clear his every right, raises no mooted or difficult issues, makes him master of his own problems, and assures him the prosperity to which he is so justly entitled.

True relief of a shackled, imprisoned slave is the striking off of shackles, the opening of the prison door, and the sending forth of a free man, on an equality with other folks. True relief for the farmer can only come by his relief from the straightjacket of discriminatory legislation, the opening of the gates of the slave pens of economical and financial oppression in which he is incarcerated, and the sending him forth a free man to manage his own affairs on an equality with other folks and to name, within reason, the price at which he will sell the products of his own toil. This and only this is real farm relief. Anything less is a delusion and a snare.

Every success ushers in new responsibilities and every gain gives more to be lost. Every breath of freedom is endangered by a threat of return to a more terrible bondage, and every great invention or discovery for the benefit of humanity makes more insidious and determined the efforts of those who toil not but who live by the toil of others, to control all the comforts and necessaries of men, women, and children and thus to enslave all peoples. There is constant warfare by the middlemen, certain monied interest, and corrupt corporate wealth to control and make enormous profits out of all farm products, the food and clothing of all peoples, all necessaries of life, every convenience of mankind, and the very lifeblood of men, women, and children everywhere. Monopolistic control of all transportation lines and other public utilities is now being sought and obtained. A determined effort is now being made to get complete control of all hydroelectric energy sites, and eventually to dominate and control the use of electricity—one of God's very greatest gifts to mankind. These very facts make very difficult, if not impossible, the proper solution of the farm problem, the Muscle Shoals problem, and other kindred problems.

Our forefathers, threatened by the wild beast and savage Indian, built fortifications for their folks and thus gained this splendid heritage for their children, and saved their children to own and possess this fair land.

So, to-day, with every human right assailed by the most tremendous forces of all times, we must, by legislation in the most positive terms, build strong and everlasting fortifications for our folks, if we are to save the purity, nobleness, and very lives of our children for our national welfare and our Nation's wealth for our children.

So, Mr. Chairman, the greatest fight of all times is for freedom of folks and for the rights of children and their fathers and mothers. Victory can only be won for our people by our being ever on the alert and ever steadfast for the right. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER].

STATES OR PROVINCES?

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Chairman, regarding the public lands and resources there is a deep-seated problem. It arises from a difference of viewpoint as to the very fundamentals of the question. A magazine of national circulation, speaking of the Western States, recently stated:

> In the immense, if not heavily populated, area the sequestration of a large minority of all land from State and local control is a problem of real magnitude and a fairly constant source of irritation. * * * In the western mountain and desert States the feeling is often expressed that the tax burden would be less if only the various classes of Government-owned land were available to the assessor. * * * Speaking generally, we question the wisdom of tax exemption. The more property reached, the less the burden on any single class or group of ratables.

The governmental areas referred to above, a majority, not "a large minority" of the lands, consist of 250,000,000 acres of reserved lands, comprising forest reserves, national parks, Indian reservations, mineral withdrawals, monuments, and power sites; and nearly 200,000,000 acres of unreserved and unappropriated domain in the Western States, as follows:

Nevada	53,925,693
Utah	26,872,218
California	20,667,431
Wyoming	19,325,762
Arizona	18,090,711
New Mexico	16,399,031
Oregon	16,349,469
Idaho	10,398,407
Colorado	7,213,300
Montana	6,696,934
Washington	896,207
South Dakota	300,956
Minnesota	250,256
North Dakota	133,237
Total	197,509,612

The problem before us began in the very early history of our National Government. The treaty with Great Britain was made with each of the thirteen colonies. It included all the land, excepting Florida, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. There was confusion among the colonies as to the territory claimed by each. But there was no doubt that the legal title was in the separate Commonwealths. This was recognized by the Continental Congress and the United States after the adoption of the Constitution. The General Government, by resolution of the Congress, asked the colonies, later States, to cede this extra territory to the United States so that sale might be made of it to provide a common fund for the payment of the Revolutionary debts, for which each of the States was liable for its own part. The United States then took upon itself, as a Nation, the payment of the Revolutionary debts of the separate States.

But the ordinances by which this was done in 1787, reenacted in 1789 after the adoption of the Constitution, provided for the permanent and greater purpose of erecting new States, as each area was populated with the necessary number of people, which was fixed at 60,000. Thus we start with the undisputed proposition of law and fact that, as to the area west of the original colonies and east of the Mississippi, excepting only Florida, the Federal Government received its title, not in itself, but as a trustee, from the original States; and the original States always had and retained ownership of all the lands within their permanent borders.

As to the areas acquired west of the Mississippi, through the Louisiana Purchase, Texas annexation, Mexican cession, the Oregon treaty, and Gadsden Purchase, the United States paid some purchase money and settled other considerations, and the cessions were made to the United States.

The legal status of the various acquisitions is stated in "Cyc" as follows:

> When the thirteen original States established their independence each State became the owner of the vacant and unappropriated lands within its borders. * * *
> And when new States were formed out of the territory of such original States, and admitted into the Union, such new States became entitled to vacant and unappropriated lands within their borders. And the ownership of the United States of lands within the limits of the original States is based upon cessions from the States.
> But when foreign governments ceded territory to the United States Government, the vacant and unappropriated land therein passed to the United States.
> And the new States which have been formed out of such territory have no title to vacant and unappropriated lands within their borders.

While there is this difference in the manner of acquirement by the Federal Government of its title to territory, I propound the inquiry: Is it possible for equal States of the Union, no matter how the territory was acquired out of which they were formed, to be in the Union of American States on a different basis from other States, even the original States, with equal rights under the Constitution? Can the new States occupy a different legal and constitutional status from the old? Yet the Atlantic Coast States owned their lands. West of those States the States did not and do not own their lands, according to the record which has been made thus far.

In the international treaties under which the various areas were acquired it was expressly stipulated, as it was in the ordinances in 1787 that separate, independent States should eventually be organized and that they should be admitted into the Union "on equal terms with the original thirteen States." This was done politically; that is, the subsequent States upon admission have had representation in accordance with the Constitution. But it was not done upon admission, or at any time, as to the land comprising these States.

All were entitled to equal status upon admission. It seems manifest that there can not be equal terms, complete and equal sovereignty, as was provided in the international treaties and the Constitution, unless ultimately, if not upon admission, the power of the Federal Government over the land that comprises a State ceases and that of the State in jurisdiction, authority, and taxation completely attaches.

In 1826 it was openly claimed and argued in the Senate as a legal and constitutional proposition that immediately upon the admission of a State into the Union it came into full ownership of all the soil within its boundaries for all purposes. The subject came up at that time because the Revolutionary War debt had been nearly paid. That specific purpose of the cessions by the States had been practically fulfilled and only one other purpose and object of the General Government with respect to the public lands remained, to wit, the establishment of new States on an absolute equality with the old.

It is impossible to say that a State is admitted on equal terms with the original States which retained and owned every foot of soil of the public lands within their borders and even public lands outside their boundaries, when approximately all the soil of that State is retained in and controlled by the General Government, tax free; and great portions permanently reserved by the Federal Government. To draw four lines on the map and call it Wyoming, without ownership of and sovereignty over the soil, even though it is given political representation, does not admit that State on an equality with the original States, for it lacks the other vitally important if not equally essential attribute.

Let us illustrate: The granting by the Federal Government to Wyoming of 500,000 acres of land, upon its admission, out of a total of more than 62,000,000 acres in its area, does not change the legal and sovereignty propositions stated. Nor does the fact that this was augmented by school sections and other grants for colleges, and later, Carey Act projects, constitute that equal sovereignty specifically provided in the Louisiana Purchase and other treaties, and clearly contemplated in the Constitution. A part is never equal to the whole. Anything less than the whole leaves unequal terms and an incomplete sovereignty.

As long as a given area of land was territory, the Constitution makes clear provision for its control by the Federal Government, in Article IV, section 3:

> Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States, and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State.

But there is not a line in the Constitution which expressly authorized the General Government to retain ownership and control after that Territory is organized into a State. On the contrary, the equality among the States fixed by the Constitution demands that the State then have absolute ownership, which includes jurisdiction, power of disposition, and taxation. And it applies to every foot of soil and everything in it to the center of the earth. Again, the international treaties provided for admittance on equal terms.

The case on behalf of the States was made by United States Senators representing the then Western States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and Missouri back in the period of 1826–1832. Their arguments were not answered. How, then, did it come about that the Federal Government retained control and the States, other than the original States, did not come into absolute ownership of their lands upon admission?

First, so far as the legal claim is concerned, based upon the international treaties, our Supreme Court finally held that it had no jurisdiction because a treaty is a matter between sovereign nations, and even though the treaties were violated by the United States it, the court, was confined to a consideration of and must uphold the laws of Congress, notwithstanding the Constitution itself makes treaties equally the supreme law of the land. (Bottiler v. Domingues, 130 U. S. 238. Ready Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580. Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 190.)

So there was and is no forum in which the legal rights of the States under those treaties could be tested and enforced. Again, the Supreme Court, in so far as it has passed on the matter, has upheld the right of the Federal Government under the Constitution to control and dispose of the public lands in such manner as Congress may provide. It has further held that this authority includes the right of the Government to make reservations of public land for public purposes, under Article IV, section 3, giving the General Government the power to "dispose" of the "territory." Also, that the Executive may withdraw lands from entry for public purposes.

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court on these subjects are stated as follows in "The Constitution of the United States of America"—annotated—1924, page 521:

> The true constitutional equality between the States only extends to the right of each, under the Constitution, to have and enjoy the same measure of local or self-government, and to be admitted to an equal participation in the maintenance, administration, and conduct of the common or National Government. (Case v. Toftus, 39 Fed. 732.)
> The words "dispose of" vest in Congress not only the power to sell but also to lease the lands of the United States. The disposal must be left to the discretion of Congress. (U. S. v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. 538.)
> No appropriation of public land can be made for any purpose but by authority of Congress. (U. S. v. Fitzgerald, 15 Pet. 421; California v. Deseret Water Co., 243 U. S. 415; Utah Power Co. v. U. S., 243 U. S. 389.)
> The power of the President to withdraw public lands from entry has been so long exercised and recognized by Congress as to be equivalent to a grant of power. (U. S. v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U. S. 459.)
> Congress has the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States" and pursuant to this power has the exclusive right to control and dispose of the public and unoccupied lands, to which the United States has acquired title, either by deeds of cessions from other States or by treaty with a foreign country; and no State can interfere with this right or embarrass its exercise. (Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 167.)

This being the legal status concerning the public lands, we are compelled to turn our faces from the courts to the Congress.

It is the exercise of this power by Congress that I wish to discuss. The present laws and policies of Congress, in my judgment, are working unjustly and inequitably against the Western States, and proposals are emanating from the departments which will accentuate and fasten upon us greater and more permanent injustice. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to give to the Western States the rights which they have not been able to present and secure in the courts. The exclusion of a legal remedy ought to make our case all the stronger, in equity and moral right, before the Congress in fixing rights by its policies and laws. Therefore let me trace some of the history of this subject in the Congress in order that we may have a proper perspective and make clearer the propositions I wish to lay down for the future.

The Public Lands Committee of the Senate in 1832 made a report, after a complete survey, favoring the ceding of the lands by the Federal Government to the States wherein the lands lay. The following is a part of such report:

> Our pledge would not be redeemed by merely dividing the surface into States and giving them names.
> The public debt being now paid, the public lands are entirely released from the pledge they were under to that object, and are free to receive a new and liberal destination for the relief of the States in which they lie * * *.
> The speedy extinction of the Federal title within their limits is necessary to the independence of the new States, to their equality with the elder States, to the development of their resources, to the subjection of their soil to taxation, cultivation, and settlement, and to the proper enjoyment of their jurisdiction and sovereignty.

And it was at this point, in 1834, that the policy of our Government was settled and fixed on the principle that the Government was to hold the legal title and as trustee dispose of the public land. It was a trust for the reason that the ordinances and international treaties made it so and the Constitution provides but one method of acquiring property for itself in absolute ownership. Article I, section 8, paragraph 16:

> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

The manufacturing States of the North Atlantic by reason of their great population controlled a majority of the votes of Congress. They did not want their people and workingmen to migrate to and settle the West. They, therefore, not only denied the legal claim, but they also determined to defeat the movement for Congress to cede the lands to the States admitted and to the subsequent States upon admission. The fact that they had had every foot of their soil and sold their public lands, and additional public lands beyond their borders, and with the proceeds built up funds for the enrichment and development of their States, did not deter them.

Henry Clay, though a westerner, from Kentucky, was a member of the Committee on Manufactures. He was an expectant candidate for the Presidency. His course may have been influenced by the voting strength of the eastern manufacturing States in the Senate, House, and country. He threw in his lot with the East, as against the then West, on the public-lands question. The report of the Manufactures Committee of the Senate, presented and argued by Clay, was against ceding the lands to the States and favored the policy which was adopted in 1834 by force of their votes, without regard to legal rights or equities, of the continued Government control of the lands even after Territories were admitted as States.

But even they denominated the Government a trustee, stating that the lands were to be administered, the Revolutionary War debt being paid, for the benefit of the States in which the lands were located, and sold into private ownership as rapidly as possible. This was afterwards and is to-day perverted to mean under the phrase "for the benefit of all the people" to include all the people of all the States. Such is the position held to-day by the States east of the Rockies, notwithstanding they have all had their lands and everything in them. The four sons of Uncle Sam—North, East, South, and West—were entitled to their equal inheritance. North, East, and South duly received theirs. Now, when the West comes of age and asks for its equal share, North, East, and South say, "Now, we will divide the last quarter among the four of us."

I mean by this that nearly all the States of this Union, except the present 11 public-land States, have gradually but finally, by transfer to private ownership, come into full possession, control, jurisdiction, taxation, and development of all their lands and resources, including surface, forests, and minerals. This was under the trusteeship policy imposed by the East against the then West. Twenty-six of the States east of the Rocky Mountains received their mineral wealth by and through purchases, mineral locations, and homesteading of the people who settled those States.

This is generally true of the States east of the Rocky Mountains. Texas retained all of its lands and minerals for itself when it was annexed. Some States were granted all their minerals when admitted or by subsequent provision that exempted them from the operation of the mining laws permitting full title to be gained by homesteading, including the minerals.

But when it came the turn of the States of the Rocky Mountain region and westward to the Pacific to be developed, the letter and the spirit of the trusteeship, as explained and placed of record in the United States Senate by those who imposed it by main force and strength of votes, in lieu of ceding to the States, has been denied, violated, and perverted by interpretation of old laws and by the passage of new laws.

The West, unable to secure their lands and resources upon admission, acquiesced in the policy which was adopted in 1834 and adjusted itself to develop thereunder. Under it all its land, including forests and minerals, would, though gradually, ultimately pass to private ownership, and thus the Western States would have come eventually, though long delayed, into full sovereignty and development.

The West was and is agreeable to the general mining law of 1866 and 1872 and later amendments whereby mineral lands were made not subject to homestead entry and mineral rights reserved from agricultural patents, but were made subject to mineral location and conveyed thereunder, on compliance with the mining law, by patent to citizens. The mineral lands were thus made available to the people and came into private ownership and taxation. This policy was acceptable, as it carried on the general plan of disposing of the public domain to the people, contributed to development, individual opportunity, and State sovereignty.

But since 1890, affecting directly, adversely, and only the Western States, a new policy has been imposed by the East, North, and South entirely different from that which was the settled policy of the Government for three-quarters of a century. They determined to divide the assets of the West among "all the people." This was and is indefensible. After sharing $577,000,000, the proceeds of the sale of their billion acres of public domain and some of ours, they have "reserved," out of a total of about 800,000,000, in the 11 public-land States, which are the 11 Western States, containing 97 per cent of all the public lands, more than 250,000,000 acres, or more than a quarter of their entire area. This means that 250,000,000 acres of these States can never be settled or developed or come into private ownership and taxation by these States.

In my judgment the Supreme Court of the United States never intended that their decision to the effect that the power to "dispose of" in the Constitution included the power "to reserve" should be extended so excessively and so outrageously invading the rights of the States. Reservations have been made to an unconstitutional extent. There is a rule of reason in law and in constitutions.

To permanently reserve and keep from development and under Federal bureau control one-fourth of a State is unconstitutional, because it is an unreasonable exercise of the right to reserve. It violates the conditions imposed in the treaties under which they were acquired. It takes no legal argument to prove this. It is obvious to all as a matter of plain sense and justice. If it can be done constitutionally, then three-fourths or nine-tenths of a State can be reserved constitutionally. That is an absurdity and proves my contention.

For example, the State of Nevada is still approximately 80 per cent under Government control. There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent, if my view is wrong, the reserving by the President and the Congress forever of all of the area of that State, thereby preventing its settlement, development, and making it tax free forever, except the 20 per cent which has been granted to that State or acquired by its people under the mining and homestead laws.

But the West says there is something in the Constitution to prevent such murder of a State of this Union. If that can be done constitutionally, and that is the position the opposition must take, then the words "Union of sovereign States" are a hollow mockery and a lie. I do not believe they are, but believe that our view is right—that the power to reserve is limited and retail, not unlimited and wholesale. It must not be exercised unreasonably.

While the Supreme Court has said that a reservation of the public land may be made by Congress (U. S. v. Shannon, 157 Fed. 863), it was not the earlier intention to deprive the new States permanently of great parts of their area. Indeed, it was the thought that in due time all of their area was to come into private ownership and under the sovereignty of the States.

This thought is clearly presented in the following statement, on page 521 of the authority above quoted:

> The right of every new State to exercise all the powers of government which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union must be admitted and remain unquestioned except so far as they are temporarily deprived of control of the public lands. (Pollard v. Hagon, 3 How. 223; Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 18 Wall. 65; Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 688; Kinglett v. U. S. Land Assn., 142 U. S. 183; Illinois Central R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 434; McCabe v. Atchison R. Co., 235 U. S. 151.)

Again, the Supreme Court in Pollard v. Hagan (3 Howard, 212 (1845)), clearly stated that equal terms and full sovereignty of the States would not be complete until the national trust was fully executed, and all lands and resources disposed of to the States or the people of the States. The language is as follows:

> Whenever the United States shall have fully executed these trusts the municipal sovereignty of the new States will be complete throughout their respective boundaries, and they and the original States will be upon an equal footing, in all respects whatever.

The denial of control by the States was considered temporary. These great reservations permanently deprive them of control. This is a complete change of policy, virtually denies ultimate sovereignty to the State, and defeats the purposes of the trust.

But even if constitutionally a quarter, a half, or three-fourths of a public-land State could be forever reserved for a so-called public purpose, it would be utterly unjust and unwise to do so, not only for these States, but also for the Nation. And yet it has been done on an average as to a quarter of each of the Western States.

The compacts with the States upon their admission, the forced price of their entrance into the Union, in their enabling acts and constitutions, whereby the newly admitted States agreed to not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, which presupposes a right to the soil of the State in the State, under the decisions of the Supreme Court simply made the Government a trustee; and, as I view it, a trustee for all the people of that State; and they did not change any constitutional right held by the State, because it is impossible for a State to include anything in its constitution, and that can add to or take away a right granted to it, or retained in it, by the Constitution of the United States.

The construction of the courts of section 3, clause 1, of the Constitution which provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union," and so forth, is expressed on page 578 of the Constitution of the United States, annotated, 1924, in the following language:

> This clause refers to and includes new States to be formed out of territory yet to be acquired, as well as that already ceded to the United States. New States when admitted have equal sovereignty with the older ones, and are entitled to all the rights of jurisdiction and eminent domain which the original States possessed, whether such equality be stipulated for in the act of admission or not. * * * When also a State enters into the Union, it solemnly pledges to the other States to support the Constitution as it is, in all its provisions, until altered in the manner which the Constitution itself provides, and she can not, by a compact with the United States, enlarge or diminish her constitutional rights or liabilities. (Illinois Central R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 434; Ward v. Race Horse, 163 U. S. 514.)

When those compacts were made, there were no great "reservations" of public land. They were not in the contemplation of the parties to the compacts. Hence the States have a right to have their trustee by said compacts "dispose of" the domain by transfer to the people as always theretofore and as it was being disposed of at the time; by purchase, homestead, mining laws, or grants for specific purposes, and not by reservation in immense areas in the trustee. The Government is not carrying out its part of the compacts, its duty as trustee. If not, then the compacts should be abrogated and the States at once reinvested with their rights and the land restored to them.

The reason given for these great reservations is "conservation." It is a great word to conjure with, especially with those who do not know and often do not care to know the facts and conditions regarding the things they insist upon "conserving." There is only one thing, upon analysis, that conservation really applies to and that is the forest land. But there is no reason why the States primarily interested, directly concerned, and dependent upon the preservation of the forest, will not conserve their own forests. They will.

The Federal Government has wasted forests in the past as well as the States. We should not be made dependencies because of the folly of the older States which permitted the destruction of their forests. Now, as to all other resources which are said to be conserved by "reservation," we do not need or want conservation. We need and want use and development. So far as my State is concerned, the range is not being destroyed and does not need to be "conserved" by a permit and fee system. There are billions of tons of coal, which, in addition to its ordinary method of use, can be converted into oil and gasoline, or ground and burned in the same manner as oil. It can be converted into gas and into electricity. The coal of the Western States is inexhaustible. A late official report estimates the amount of oil in our coal and lignites at about 104,000,000,000 barrels of motor fuel. Nobody will waste it; it can not be wasted. Oil is practically inexhaustible for, in addition to the oil pools constantly discovered, produced by flow and pump, the oil sands of all fields, still containing 70 per cent of all the oil they ever contained, will be mined and the 70 per cent recovered. Oil is not being wasted.

Again, the United States Geological Survey and the Secretary of the Interior are my authority for the statement that we have 60,000,000,000 barrels of oil in the 10,000 square miles of oil shale in the Green River formation in the corner of Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah; and in all the oil shales of this country, 92,000,000,000 barrels. In manufacturing oil from shale, there will not be millions of dollars wasted in "dry holes." Every ton of shale treated will produce 10 to 40 gallons of oil.

We want our great deposits of potash and phosphate, aluminum and asbestos used and not kept useless by imprisonment under "conservation." So-called conservation does not justify the withholding from the States and their legitimate use all these resources by "reservation," or leasing acts which hinder the industries with restrictions and excessive royalties. The mining law was invaded as to coal, oil, oil shale, gas, phosphate, and sodium, by the leasing act, and location and patent denied. Theoretically, the forest lands are open to homesteading and location of minerals, but in fact they are not. Entries are denied. Prospecting and discoveries have ceased.

What further encroachments now threaten us? It is actually proposed by the Interior Department, and bills have been introduced in Congress to repeal homestead laws and place the remainder of the public domain not already reserved under a Federal leasing system! "System" is the correct word. That system abides and constantly enlarges. The system, year after year and decade after decade, continues in office, building precedent on precedent, always advancing, enlarging their scope, claiming and taking more and more power, by new interpretations and by securing the passage of laws when their objects can not be gained by rule and regulation. Bureaus and boards are made up of officials who are perfectly honest, hard-working, able Government servants; but they are imbued with the very essence of the spirit of the system. Their viewpoint is the Federal viewpoint. They work and build accordingly. When they pass their successors carry on. The heart of the system is human nature, which seeks expansion and power. A bureau perpetuates itself and its spirit. Every new precedent established is another inch gained for Federal power and, of course, incidentally, the power of the bureau and its personnel. The system grows from that upon which it feeds. The more it feeds, the stronger its appetite. The stronger its appetite, the more it feeds. And always its food is the rights of the States and the individual citizens of the States. "On what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he hath grown so great?" On the substance and freedom of the citizen and of the local self-governments. Thus comes centralization at Washington in all departments. I believe in a strong central government, in the Union, in a nation as builded upon the Constitution; but that Constitution reserves certain rights in the States and the people. The West is for the whole Constitution, which designed a balanced Government, Federal and State. We are striving to maintain that balance.

This proposed grazing lease system on all of the balance of the public domain means perpetual Government control, it dooms those great areas to the status of a Federal pasture. It means that the remaining lands could never be entered, acquired, and transferred to private ownership or the ownership of the States. It involves still another imposition in the form of grazing fees in addition to the brood of fees, royalties, charges, tributes which have already been exacted from the western resources. It means another profit-making reserve of 200,000,000 more acres in the 11 Western States; making a total, with the areas already reserved, of 450,000,000 acres, which amounts to 55 per cent of their total area, of which the Western States are to be forever deprived as to sovereignty, settlement, and taxation.

The Western States can never be convinced that such usurpation of more than half of these States can be constitutionally done or that it is wisdom, statesmanship, right, or justice, or in the best interests of the United States of America.

Take, for example, the State of Wyoming, if such a grazing bill passes. Wyoming would never be sovereign or be able to tax not only the 18,000,000 acres now reserved, but 20,000,000 acres more, the amount of our present unreserved domain; a total of 38,000,000 acres; 62 per cent of its area! And its people would be subject forever, as to that great part of her surface with all it contains, to bureau landlordism and to pay tribute for its use at the same time. And yet it must at its own expense extend over all its 62,000,000 acres police jurisdiction, preserve law and order by its courts, and provide roads and schoolhouses for what people might be scattered over all this area. The same condition would prevail in every Western State.

It is an amazing proposition which is intolerable to contemplate. The highest interests of the settler, the ordinary stock grower, the average livestock companies and corporations, and of the State as a whole demand its defeat. It is the first duty of the public-land States to see to it that such additional shackle is not clamped upon them.

The pending bills providing for grazing permits or leasing systems with imposition of fees in renewable periods of 10 years will cause all settlement and home building to cease. One of the bills repeals the 640-acre stock-raising homestead. The Secretary of the Interior recommends its repeal. Even if permitted under the terms of the bills, homesteading could not be carried on simultaneously with a permit or leasing plan. No man wants a homesteader in the middle of his leased area and no homesteader wants a home surrounded by leased lands. Conflict would be inevitable. The Secretary of the Interior has twice stated in his annual reports and in letters and addresses that the character of the land now left can not be successfully settled under the 160, the 320, or the 640 acre acts. So that it is not to be expected that he will designate any of the remaining area for homesteading, even if the proposed grazing bills should so provide. He has recommended, if a grazing bill should not be passed, that the stock-raising homestead area be enlarged from 640 acres to 1,280 acres, having come to the conclusion that such an area is required to make a home and a living on the remaining lands.

The people are still land hungry and desirous of making homes in the West. The proof of this is the large number who filed entries under the homestead acts during the last year, 1927, aggregating 3,236,764 acres. Homesteading results in the raising of more livestock than the open range. The consumer benefits thereby.

The public-land States must take their stand upon this underlying fundamental principle—that it is the purpose of the treaties, the Constitution, it has been and should continue to be the policy of this Government to transfer as rapidly as possible to the people, in limited acreage for business, living, home, settlement, development, State taxation, and sovereignty every acre of public domain that is now left.

The trust in the Government was not created to go on forever. It is time it was finally executed and terminated. In no other way than in transferring to the people of each State or to the States the lands left in such States can the Federal trust be executed. Any other course is a breach of that national trust, a violation of a sacred obligation to the States—the States wherein the lands lie, for they and their people are the true and lawful beneficiaries of that trust and not those who have already had their inheritance, either by retaining it originally or by having the later imposed trust fully executed and receiving the complete rights to which they are entitled. The West is now entitled at least to its unreserved lands.

As to the fourth of the area of the Western States which is now reserved in parks, forest, Indian reservations, power sites, monuments, mineral withdrawals, and oil reserves, these reservations are utterly unreasonable areas to be withheld forever from the States. With the exception of the national parks, which, I take it, we are willing to concede as a possible legitimate exercise of the power of reservation as long as the areas are reasonable or as a distinctly national resource which we are willing shall be enjoyed by all the people under Federal management, ultimately all the reservations should be turned over to the States. If they are not so returned, then all of the people for whom they are taken should pay to the part of the people from whom they are taken their reasonable value. The General Government should make recompense by payment of their value or pay annually an amount equivalent to what would be collected in taxation from them on a valuation based upon their developed resources. Each Western State is entitled to its own—no more and no less—just as the States or the people of the States east of the Rockies have received their own.

One of these two courses, either cession to the States or compensation for these great reservations, must be adopted if justice is to be done. The Western States should take their stand on that declaration without doubt, hesitation, equivocation, or "shadow of turning." That position is founded on the rock of right—and it can never be overthrown. It is just, logical, imperative, and inevitable. Right must prevail. [Applause.]

Returning to the matter of the balance of the unreserved and unappropriated domain of 200,000,000 acres in the West, which is now planned to be placed under a leasing system, I lay down the following propositions: It should be left open as free range until proper disposition is made of it; that disposition shall not be by further Federal reservations for any purpose, or held forever under any leasing or permit system preventing acquisition by the people. The disposition which is commanded in the Constitution and the settled policy of this Nation should be made, to wit, transfer by direct sale, mineral location, or enlarged homesteads to the people; or by cession to the States. The Government should plan to cease functioning in a matter which can now be managed by the several States.

The fundamental principle which should govern the whole question of the unreserved public domain remaining is the transfer to private ownership in limited areas. That is the primary proposition. How this is accomplished, while very important, is secondary. It can be done; first, through direct sales in restricted amounts as to the surface by the Government to the people for a nominal price of 50 cents to $1 per acre, according to classification, with several years in which to pay; the proceeds to be returned to the States of origin in case or through reclamation projects. Secondly, through the enlargement of the area of stock-raising homesteads to 1,280 or 2,560 acres, with less cash requirements for improvements and less burdensome rules as to residence and cultivation; permitting those who have homesteaded to take additional areas to make up the total enlarged area.

In either of these two ways, I contend, the ultimate best use of the land will be effected to the greatest good to the greatest number. Once privately owned, these lands will inevitably find their greatest use and best economic level. In case either of these methods is used it would be for surface rights only. The mineral rights now included in the mineral leasing law, and all minerals should be made over to the States to handle as their legislatures may determine.

Third, most simple and comprehensive, the lands with all their resources should be ceded to the States, so that the States could make the disposition to private ownership as to the surface and evolve such plan of handling the mineral resources as they see fit, looking to the best interests of agriculture, of livestock, and the mining interests, and of the State as a whole, for all its people, in accordance with the conditions in each State.

Eastern representatives and people frequently complain of and oppose Federal aid in reclamation, roads, colleges, schools, land grants for certain objects, and other purposes, forgetting the fact that the Federal Government holds these great public reservations and vast areas of public domain, which are nontaxable. Why should not the Government give even greater aid than it has when it holds the greater part of our States without taxation and prevents settlement?

Turn the balance of the public domain with all its resources over to the States and they will cease calling upon the Government for special benefits on account of this unusual condition. They will gladly attend to their own needs and welcome release from the necessity of making these requests. They will then ask for no more than the rest of the States of the Union, with whom they have the right to proportional benefits of any general plan of internal improvements under national policies.

Thus, by one of these three methods, will the States come into that full sovereignty and equality with the other States to which they are entitled as a matter of equity and right, equality and dignity, as sister States of the American Union and receive the material return, not in part as a dole from Washington, but in full, in their own right, from the resources with which they have been endowed. That endowment no man, no party, no administration, no group of States however powerful and numerically strong in Congress, no just nation and trustee should withhold.

Are we to be States or Provinces? We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all States are created equal; that they are endowed by the organic law with certain inalienable rights; that among these are, life, which implies and requires equal sovereignty over their soil and all the riches therein, as the means of existence; liberty, which means freedom from discrimination and ultra-Federal control not imposed on most of the States, and freedom in local self-government to the same extent granted to any of the States; and the pursuit of happiness, which means development under the same conditions for the new and later States as were enjoyed by the original and other States, with equal rights and advantages for their citizens in their lands and resources, which are essential to the well-being of their people. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, whenever the administration is puzzled, it sends into the parliamentary arena to defend the puzzle, the amiable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who wonders what this great, big world is all about.

To-day the gentleman started to defend the naval program of the administration. Admittedly, he knew little about the Navy, and, finally, concluded he knew nothing about the administration's naval program, and yet there is nothing terrible about that because neither does the administration. [Laughter.] In commenting on the Washington Disarmament Conference he at last solved the real result. He said Hughes made a great speech. Yes; Hughes made a great speech and Great Britain and Japan got the battleships.

There should be no particular excitement about the gentleman from Massachusetts being confused about the President and the Navy, and he should not be disturbed by the fact that the country is a little bit confused about the President and the Navy. As a matter of fact, on all the major problems of the country the administration is pretty well confused. Not only on the Navy but on farm relief, on coal policies, on taxes, and even on "not choosing to run" the administration is entirely surrounded by confusion.

In 1926 the President sent a message to the Congress and said that we had a Navy equal to any navy in the world, and this year the Secretary of the Navy, with the consent of the President, sends to Congress a naval program that has startled the American people.

Last year the President went so far as to send a letter to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Navy, which was read from the desk, begging us not to go ahead too far on appropriating money, indicating that we should keep our appropriations down to enough for a "paper" Navy, and my good friend the majority leader [Mr. TILSON], also a great defender of the administration, but who only takes the well when the administration is half puzzled on a proposition and who never goes out on a limb like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], came along and followed the President's suggestion on a "paper" Navy and offered his amendment authorizing $450,000 to start drawing contracts for new cruisers. The only man on this side of the House who came out foursquare for an American naval program was the Speaker of the House. The rest of the Republican group went along with the President on his "blue-print" Navy.

Now, what has happened between the message of 1926 and the Wilbur program of to-day for the future? Was it the Geneva conference that had anything to do with it? No; the Geneva conference was not a building conference; it simply failed to be a conference of limitation. Now, what has really happened? To-morrow we celebrate the birthday of a great American who said, "In time of peace prepare for war."

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7201) entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. HARRISON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLACK of New York. As I was saying before the Senate intruded, but not with the tax bill, to-morrow we celebrate the birthday of a great American, who said, "In time of peace prepare for war," and we are living in the administration of another great American, who believes "in time of peace prepare for elections."

Last year he wanted to keep us down to a paper Navy. Why? Because he wanted to keep appropriations down, because he wanted to create a surplus, because he wanted to give the people tax reduction, and we came along in this session of Congress and the Democrats, with the more intellectual members of the Republican Party, gave the country a tax-reduction program, and now the President does not care about the tax-reduction program, but has it on ice over in the Senate and now declares he is for a large Navy, repudiating and throwing into the wastebasket his message of last year in which he said we have a Navy equal to any navy in the world.

Now our friend from Massachusetts, the birthplace of the intellectuals of the country, said we are not engaging in a competitive-building program. My God, if we are not engaged in a competitive-building program, what are we engaged in? Surely we are not building battleships to fight canoes. We are building battleships, we are building cruisers, we are building submarines, we are building aircraft carriers because other nations are doing the same thing, and if that is not competition, I do not know what competition is. Why can they not be honest and straightforward with the American people and say we have been forced to go ahead with a competitive-building program because of the weak-kneed Secretary of State that we have in the State Department?

The gentleman from Massachusetts in reviewing the disarmament conference said that the American program was a program of cutting down capital-ship construction; in other words, Hughes and the other men went into the conference with the idea of destroying the American Navy. Well, I give Hughes greater credit than that. The American program as submitted by Mr. Hughes at the outset of the Naval Disarmament Conference in Washington was a program of limitation all down the line. We were to cut down on capital ships and on all auxiliary craft, and what happened? That very cagey gentleman, Lord Balfour, realizing that the American politician must get a result, even if it is to the destruction of his own country, went along and gave three cheers for our former Secretary of State, escorted him to the platform and said, "I take it on myself to make this great friend of peace the chairman." Mr. Hughes became the chairman and submitted this program. What did they do? Naturally, the first item on the program was the capital ships and Great Britain went along beautifully, and they agreed we should cut down our capital ships; and when they got through cutting down our capital ships they forgot about the rest of the Hughes program, and because we had to get a result, because the Harding administration had to get a result, we agreed to the limitation on capital ships.

But under the 5-5-3 ratio there should have been a provision for auxiliary craft to help the major ships. But this great lawyer Hughes, forget to put any such clause in the disarmament treaty, and that left Mr. Balfour and the Japanese to go on and build up auxiliary craft without a word of protest from Washington, D. C., or from Hughes. That is the situation they brought us to—through an entire lack of statesmanship on the part of the Republican Party. Now the disarmament friends and others of the Republican Party thought they had done something, and they wanted the whole world to know that they had stopped competition in the construction of battleships. They wanted the whole world to know that it was the Republicans and that our party had nothing to do with it. But now that the Washington conference is under fire, that great research expert [Mr. TREADWAY] found out that Mr. UNDERWOOD was a delegate. I said in response to him to-day that that was the reason why we had any Navy left at all.

Now, what was the function of Mr. UNDERWOOD? Mr. UNDERWOOD attended to the management of the Far East question. He worked out a program of peace with China and the Asiatic people; he worked out a foundation that, if we had lived up to it, we would control the Chinese field in trade, but instead of that this weak-kneed administration has consented to run along with the British, and every time the British sent one man over there this administration sent two, and when the British sent one flag there the United States sent two. If we had followed Mr. UNDERWOOD we would have had peace in China.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York agree?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Sure we agree. I want the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. SNELL], chairman of the Rules Committee, one of the leaders of the House, who was sent down here to protect the great State of New York. Last year he lined up for the paper Navy. I want to tell this great chairman that if we do have a war with Great Britain or Japan that that paper Navy will be shot through with more holes than the gentleman can find in the cheese that is made up in his district. [Laughter.]

Now, on the general proposition Great Britain has made a precedent for the control of the high seas—Great Britain has always insisted that that nation was the economic leader of the world and should control the high seas. The United States has become the economic leader of the World—the President of the United States in his message indicated that we were the greatest economic factor in the world, and if that is so, according to the British precedent, we are entitled to control the high seas. We have not insisted on that. We have insisted simply on a parity on the high seas, and when we have made that concession to Great Britain, Great Britain has no complaint about our new naval program. Under the existing policy in Great Britain and her appropriations Great Britain will reach 400,000 tons of cruiser strength, our suggestion at Geneva, five years before us. There should be no complaint among Americans about our building 400,000 tons of cruisers.

Now to the Americans who think the British are so wonderful in protecting themselves let me say this:

If the British Admiralty thinks that 600,000 tons of cruisers are needed to protect an inferior economic power, why can they not say that 400,000 tons of cruisers are necessary to protect a greater economic power?

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the Naval Affairs Committee is going to do. Evidently, somebody in the administration has gotten cold feet on this naval program. If Wilbur was right when he sent his program to Congress, he is right now. If the General Board was right when Wilbur sent his program to Congress, the General Board is right now. What I want to know is this: Are we going to take our estimates of naval needs from our own naval experts sitting in the General Board or are our Navy needs to be determined by the politics of the administration? If the General Board, a board of experts who study the question, says that we need so much, and the Secretary of the Navy who has not resigned, even though I suggested it, by the way, has adopted the program of the naval board, why should this great strong man in the White House run away from his General Board, run away from his Secretary of the Navy, because a few editorials appear in the newspapers about noncompetitive armament? The British are not running away. They stopped building a few cruisers, and why? Out of consideration for us? No, but because they realized that from a defensive standpoint they made a mistake in building 10,000-ton cruisers. At the next armament conference they are going to call for a smaller type of cruiser. They do not intend to build anything that they will scrap. I hope the Naval Affairs Committee will not follow our friend TREADWAY, because if they do, God knows where they will go. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, on April 21, 1927, after noticing an article in the Baltimore Press wherein the prohibition administrator, John F. J. Herbert, had sanctioned the use of guns and blackjacks, I wrote to Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews requesting the dismissal of Mr. Herbert. At that time I called his attention to the fact that the agents involved were charged with using a blackjack on the prisoner and then attempted to hug and kiss the prisoner's wife. To the charge of using the blackjack the agents attempted to blame their subordinate, their chauffeur, one Edward L. Boone. Boone, in turn, denied that he had used the blackjack and claimed the agents were trying to make him the goat. You will note that there is no denial of the fact that the man had been blackjacked by some one in the Prohibition Department and they were blaming each other, none of whom contended that the blackjacking was done in self-defense; and to the charge of attempting to hug and kiss the prisoner's wife the agents' defense was that they were just kidding and mixing a little fun with their work. You will note from this statement the character of men that the prohibition administrator of Maryland has working under him. Since then, the prohibition administrator has employed men who have been convicted of robbery and has retained a man who has been charged with murdering a man 73 years of age, and during the pending of the trial the man was kept in office notwithstanding the fact that the testimony showed at the trial of which he was acquitted that he had operated stills prior to his appointment in the department, and since his appointment has had interest in stills, and has been receiving graft from bootleggers. In that connection, I want to call your attention to my resolution No. 99, which I introduced on January 17. To show you further the character of men that he insists on having in his department, I want to call your attention to the case of the State of Maryland against Robert H. Beall, a stenographic report of which I have and am willing to give to the Committee on Rules, which will show that these men, in order to protect each other, have no respect for their oath of office, as was shown in this case. In that case, Beall was charged with striking a widow on the head with a bottle because she was crying out not to kill an alleged prisoner whom Beall was about to hit on the head with a bottle. Her screaming made Beall so angry that he deliberately threw the bottle out the window where the lady was standing thereby injuring her and caused her to be taken to the hospital.

The testimony of the witnesses in that case shows that there were three agents, one assistant, and two alleged prisoners. The lady positively identified Beall as being the one who threw the bottle, and this was corroborated by a disinterested witness. On the other hand, the testimony of the agent disclosed that Beall with another agent had come into the place and had the two boys in charge, and that they asked for an assistant. All of the agents positively testified that Beall did not throw the bottle, but upon cross-examination none of them were able to state Beall's position in the room. I want you to bear in mind that Beall with another agent went there first, and they asked for assistance when the other agent and assistant came in with the two prisoners—one was held by one agent and the other prisoner was about to attack the agent, not Mr. Beall—and while they all testified that Beall did not throw the bottle, none of the agents stated that Beall had any of the prisoners, nor were they able to tell just where he was located in the room, and the trouble occurred only in that one room. The question which arises is this: When Beall first went into the building and asked for aid that he and the other agent were having trouble, why did Beall permit the boys or men to attack an agent without him—Beall—assisting the agent who was being attacked. The true story is that the agents were not telling the truth, and under cross-examination they were unable to corroborate their testimony. A copy of this testimony I sent to Commissioner Doran, in reply to which on September 8, 1927, he said:

> I have read over the record personally, and it is my opinion that the facts as related by the various witnesses do not present a very clear picture of what actually occurred. I find upon inquiry that the entire matter has been transferred to the Federal court, and I am sure that you would not seek a final determination on a matter of this sort which is still pending in court.

I would like to know why, and I think the Members of the House should know why, Doctor Doran upon obtaining a copy of the testimony of all the parties interested, why he should make inquiry. It seems to me, and I am willing to permit the lawyers of this Congress to read over this record, and I venture to say that 90 per cent of them would say that these men committed perjury.

I do not want to make you think I am a fanatic on this question, Mr. Chairman. Some of you may think that my resolution requesting an investigation of Mr. Herbert's methods is prompted solely against the Volstead Act, but it is not. I do not know what the conditions are in other States, but I do know that the machinery conducted by the courts and the district attorney and the prohibition administrator for the district of Maryland is something that this Congress should inquire into. While it is true that on April 21, 1927, they all denied the terms of my open letter in which I stated as follows: "That I had recently noticed in the Baltimore press that the prohibition agents operating under Prohibition Administrator Herbert had been very active with their guns and blackjacks, and according to the inclosed clipping of the Baltimore News of April 21, 1927, Prohibition Administrator John F. J. Herbert sanctioned strong-arm methods." Even their action in order to protect an agent, who is charged with the murder of a 73-year-old farmer, testimony showing that the agent was a bootlegger prior to his appointment and had received graft and was interested in bootlegging, in order to protect an agent of that type, what happens? Before the trial of this case, the combination who has to do with the enforcement of the law from the judge who heard the case, with the prohibition administrator and the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, both of whom were imported into Maryland, the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, I have been informed, in cases of this kind assists the district attorney in selecting the jurors in private. I am sorry to see that they have been able to use Judge Coleman in this matter—a man who had commanded the respect of the members of the bar and the public, which respect I fear he has lost when he permitted the Anti-Saloon League to have him put the gag on the newspapers. What did the judge do? About two weeks before the trial started Judge Coleman, of the United States District Court for the District of Maryland, called in the editors and the owners of all the Baltimore papers, and first having them agree that what transpired would be confidential, gave his views as to how he wished the trial to be reported.

He laid down the rule that no photographs were to be taken in or about the courthouse and that no pictures of the principal were to be printed during the progress of the trial, saying that if minor witnesses were photographed somewhere outside he had no particular objection. He further emphasized that the reporters were to avoid words such as "killers," "murderers," "shooting" in their description of testimony. He said that a calm tone must be followed in every account, and that no advance stories that the trial was going to take place should be published. The owners apparently gathered the impression that some punishment might be meted out to them if the wishes were disobeyed because the rules were generally followed.

When told, on Wednesday afternoon, February 15, 1928, by one reporter that photographs were being made outside the courthouse by the Washington News, the judge, in his private chamber, said that—

Anyone taking pictures in or about the courthouse, better watch out.

Why, it is getting so now that the press is unable to give you the facts as they see it or give you a picture of the man who is charged with the murder of the 73-year-old farmer. Things are getting rather strong, but, notwithstanding the ironclad methods of the courts, the district attorney, the prohibition administrator, and the outside influence of the importer from Ohio, the district attorney feeling that he will, perhaps, have to answer to his Maker sometime for defending agents for crimes committed, sanctions, not intentionally, the letter that I wrote on April 21, 1927, in that the agents were free with their guns and blackjacks when he said that he would write a letter to the prohibition administrator that he should call a conference of the agents and caution them regarding the use of their firearms. These are the words that were used by the district attorney: "Their job is an unpopular one and they can not be too careful. There are few cases where shooting is necessary, and, in view of the hostility toward their work, they should be watched." So you will see that Colonel Woodcock does not care to defend any more of them as he has done in the past, because he knows that the agents were not justified in killing. So I say, my friends, that while they deny and protest against my resolution, they unconsciously support my views that the agents who are enforcing this law in the State of Maryland and in the District of Columbia are men who use their guns and weapons too freely and are men who are untrustworthy.

On February 18 I called the attention of the district attorney to the testimony tending to show that Agent Brewer, who had been acquitted of murder, had been a bootlegger prior to his appointment, and since his appointment had been interested in stills and had received graft and requested him to advise me whether or not he would present those facts to the grand jury. While I have not received an answer from him I note from this morning's paper that he will not present the facts to the grand jury, nor will the Prohibition Unit dismiss such men. If such are the facts, how do you expect the American people to respect such a law?

I want to call your attention to the employment of a boy 17 years of age by the name of Stewart S. Shelton. It is true that they deny that they employ anyone under age, but the brother, Maurice Shelton, 19 years old, stated that he was employed as an undercover agent for the prohibition department and resigned January 15; that the prohibition agents employ boys without asking their age and their address. The agents here in Washington raided a home and destroyed some wine, the agents claiming that they had made a buy a few days previously. What right has an agent to destroy something that under the twenty-ninth section of the Volstead Act you are entitled to have and to make for your home use? Do not you believe that the agent should wait until a conviction before taking the law in his own hands and destroy something that law permits us to have? Is the agent to be sole judge and prosecutor? I want to say to the Members of the House that the facts presented by my resolution and the action of the judge and the district attorney in the Brewer case justifies this House to pass my resolution, because the judge's action by putting the gag on the newspapers two weeks prior to the trial, and the district attorney's statement after the acquittal of the agent, shows that there is something rotten in Denmark. So I trust that the Committee on Rules will see fit in recommending the passage of my resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ENGLAND].

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, on February 9 the Senate passed Senate Concurrent Resolution 10, requesting that the Interstate Commerce Commission transmit to Congress, on or before April 15, 1928, the following information, to wit: (a) Copies of all decisions, if any, handed down by it in the five years preceding the 1st day of April, 1928, in which its decisions as to the reasonableness of any rate or rates were in any sense influenced by the competitive advantage or disadvantage of the producers in one State, district, or section as compared with the advantage or disadvantage of the producers in another State, district, or section; (b) a full and complete citation of the section or sections of the interstate commerce act, as amended, and other acts under which the commission claims and believes it was granted the power to equalize prosperity among the producers of commodities; and (c) a statement of the clause or clauses, articles, or amendments of the Constitution under which it claims and believes the decisions of such character and purport were authorized or were implied.

This resolution contains a very pertinent inquiry and should be concurred in by this House without delay.

I desire to discuss especially the policy of the commission in rate making on lake cargo coal shipments.

THE LAKE CARGO COAL FREIGHT-RATE CONTROVERSY

About 30,000,000 tons of coal are sold annually from docks on the Great Lakes. This coal is transported by rail from competing districts in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio, known as the northern districts, and from West Virginia, eastern Kentucky, Virginia, and Tennessee, and known as the southern districts, to ports on Lake Erie, whence it is shipped to docks on the upper Lakes and thence transported over wide areas in Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the two Dakotas.

Prior to 1911 the freight differential, or freight-rate advantage, favoring the Pittsburgh district over the southern districts was 9 cents a ton, and the rate advantage of the eastern Ohio district 12 cents a ton.

In 1910 the original Lake Cargo Freight Rate case was instituted by northern operators. It resulted in 1912 in the increase of the freight-rate advantage of the Pittsburgh district of 10 cents on each ton of lake coal, the differential being increased from 9 cents to 19 cents. This advantage remained with the Pittsburgh and other northern districts until 1917, when the Interstate Commerce Commission again increased the freight-rate advantages of the northern districts, widening the differential to 25 cents a ton on shipments to Lake Erie ports.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGLAND. I would prefer to finish my statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I find that I shall have to leave the Chamber very soon and the point that the gentleman is making is very important to my section of the country. I would like to ask a question right there.

Mr. ENGLAND. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. I live in the fruit belt in my State. Our people ship a great deal of fruit. They claim that there is such discrimination against them as the gentleman is pointing out here. Does the Interstate Commerce Commission ever attempt to answer these complaints? I have never been able to get anything from them. Has the gentleman been able to get any explanation as to why this discrimination is used by them against certain sections and certain shipments?

Mr. ENGLAND. I have not, personally. In fact, I do not believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission has any real policy that it follows. I am inclined further to believe that that is true, after hearing the testimony of Commissioner Esch before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman is evidently striking an important matter there, because I know there are complaints of that character all over the country. It appears that the Interstate Commerce Commission will never give any intelligent reason why this discrimination is adopted.

Mr. ENGLAND. I have never heard any. I do not think any can be given.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, this is one of the reasons: It seems to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission is developing a policy of zoning this country. The freight-rate structure of the country was built up on the proposition of bringing about or inviting competition in the widest distribution of the products of the country. But their policy, it seems, is to zone this country, and if certain products are not within that zone the rates are such that you can not ship outside of that zone.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the gentleman know of any reason that they have given?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No. The policy is wrong. This country was not built up on a policy of rate zoning throughout the country. I have noticed that they have developed a policy of zoning. If you have fruits in a certain section and it comes outside of a certain zone you can not ship your fruits.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman does not indorse that policy?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I certainly do not. That policy has this further danger about it: It has the power to affect the transfer of prosperity from one section to another section, and to break down the industry of one section and to transfer its benefits to another section.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is exactly what it does, and that is why I think it is unfair.

Mr. ENGLAND. Manifestly so. In other words, it gives the commission the power to control the industry of various sections of the Nation, one section to the disadvantage of another, and thereby control the competitive markets of the various sections.

In 1922 the Pittsburgh and eastern Ohio operators returned for the third time to ask greater freight-rate advantages over southern competitors. In 1925 the commission dismissed the petition of the northern operators. Within six months it granted a reconsideration, and in 1927 gave to the Pittsburgh and eastern Ohio operators an additional freight-rate advantage of 20 cents a ton, making the differential favoring Pittsburgh 45 cents on each ton of the high-volatile fields of the southern districts and 60 cents a ton on the low-volatile Pocahontas and New River fields of southern West Virginia.

The increased advantages extended to the Pittsburgh and eastern Ohio coal operators on Lake cargo coal shipments since 1912 amounts to 400 per cent.

The gifted Senator from Pennsylvania had declaimed frequently on the Senate floor that the mines of Pennsylvania were idle because preferential freight rates had been accorded to the southern shippers. How any shipper of any commodity with an advantage in freight rates ranging from 9 cents to 60 cents could be injured by such an advantage I am unable to conceive. The assumption is not sustained either by logic or facts. If the southern mine owners had possessed during these years the same freight-rate advantages that have been given to the preferred operators of the Pittsburgh district, untold wealth would have flowed into those districts south of the Ohio River. The southern shippers have been forced to compete in these markets under very heavy disadvantageous freight rates.

While incapable of demonstrating to the normal mind, it appears that the Pittsburgh operators, supported by the great protected industrial and commercial interests of western Pennsylvania, have been able to convince the Interstate Commerce Commission that shrinkage in their tonnage in the Northwest has been due to unfavorable freight rates. They have termed the higher freight rates paid by the southern shippers as preferable, and the commission has ignored the fact that the northern districts have been working under local economic disadvantages and that freight rates have been the sole advantage possessed by these northern districts.

To overcome these economic troubles that the northern districts have waged continually for a number of years, the Interstate Commerce Commission has forgotten that it is an agency created for the regulation of railroad rates and has become thoroughly imbued that it is within its province to distribute the commerce of the country in accordance with its own will. To do so it applies the freight-rate advantage as a measure of destruction to those communities which have shown efficiency in production and raises the freight-rate standard to protect the inefficient.

It is an inescapable fact that the northern districts have suffered from economic handicaps, self-imposed, and that these economic ills have been increased rather than alleviated by continual mounting freight-rate advantages.

Under the 9-cent differential, from 1907 to 1911, the northern districts shipped 70.21 per cent of the Lake coal; under the 19-cent differential the Pittsburgh and eastern Ohio districts shipped 58.94 per cent of the Lake coal, and under the 25-cent differential the northern districts shipped 28.41 per cent of the Lake coal. After the freight-rate advantages of the Pittsburgh and eastern Ohio districts were increased by the Interstate Commerce Commission their shipments of Lake tonnage diminished.

There comes a time, however, when the more efficient producer can no longer survive under artificial and arbitrary freight rates that are made operative to protect the inefficient. When that point is reached the inefficient become the master of the markets, attaining their position through special privileges, and as such dominate these markets through the artificial monopoly created.

THE COMMISSION'S DESTRUCTIVE POLICIES

The power to tax is the power to destroy. Equally destructive is the power exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission to impose unjust and burdensome freight rates on shippers, industries, and consumers. The exercise of the power by the commission to shift commerce from one producing community to another and regulate its disposal in the consuming markets has its origin in the authority vested by Congress, giving its agency discretionary control over freight rates.

By extending to the commission authority to regulate freight rates, this creature of the Congress has assumed the broad authority to give it the power of life and death over commerce and to allocate the markets of the Nation among the favored producers.

We have to look only at the pages of the RECORD of this body to find that public attention has been directed to the impeding dangers that follow prosecution of this policy. The commission has been honestly and sincerely condemned for this usurpation of power by the following of this policy. Large investments have been sacrificed and business enterprises have crumpled because the commission has seen fit to deny to producers a right to dispose of their products in free and open competition with other producers. It is an attempted restoration by the commission of the rebate system that Congress banished years ago. Viciousness of the rebate system to kill and cripple and destroy competition in the markets was recognized and it was outlawed. The policy of the commission to extend subsidies to favored shippers in the form of favorable freight rates is as reprehensible and as vicious as the rebate system that met with the disfavor of the American public. I recall that in a discussion of the decision of the commission in the western railroad cases almost two years ago that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] said:

> Capital is fearful, and is justly fearful, of making huge or considerable investments when the sword of Damocles is hanging over them and they do not know when it will fall.

In the colloquy during the same debate between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the latter was as emphatic, and justly so, in his condemnation of the policy of the commission to build up one community at the expense of another. I recall that he said:

> I would like to submit a question to the Senator from Ohio. If he and his associates desired to begin business in some section of the country * * * would he like to make an investment and build up an industry, or an industrial center, knowing that at some time the question might arise as to whether his business was to be destroyed by a rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?
> I say to the Senator now that if the applications that have been made and will be made were supplanted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as they have been in the past, the Senator's industrial center would be destroyed.
> What I want to see accomplished is this: I want the power taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any other agency of the Government, to say: "I will build up this section of the country, I will destroy this section, by making rates that will do it."
> I want it distinctly understood by every American citizen, or anyone who desires to invest money in any part of this country, that he will not be discriminated against and that there shall be no power left in any agency of our Government to say hereafter that he shall be.

Commissioner John J. Esch wrote a dissenting opinion in this case that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] declared was brutal and selfish. The Senator from Nevada discussed the policies of the commission at length tending to destroy our enterprises through arbitrary control of freight rates. The Senator said:

Whenever we start in to utilize the railroads of this country for the purpose of building up one place at the expense of another we get back to the old rebate system.

Look into the dissenting opinion of Commissioner Esch—as brutal and selfish a decision as a man ever wrote * * *.

We are to look after the railroads. We are looking after their welfare. It never occurred to him that he had the interest of the people of this country to look after.

It has been the attitude of some of the members of the commission that they were put there for the purpose of being general managers for the railroads, to get business for them, to make them pay.

The proposition is that instead of using our transportation facilities for the purpose of moving our products to markets in the cheapest possible way, we are continually disturbing ourselves to see whether this town or that is getting the best of it or the worst of it.

There never was any authority granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate railroads for making discriminations. You can not find a line in the act that ever was intended to give them the power of utilizing any regulating authority to restrict transportation in the interests of any community or against any community. That proposition has grown up through their legislative absorption of power. There is no question about that.

What we are trying to do is to fix a policy, a principle, not to interfere with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission was constituted for the purpose of rate making and regulating the railroads. It was not appointed for the purpose of deciding whether West Virginia or Virginia or Pennsylvania shall have the Boston market. It was never intended that the commission should have the power to take into consideration market conditions and distances or should have the power to say that one coal mine shall ship its product to this market and another coal mine to another market; that the iron mines shall ship to some other market; that one city shall be great and that another city shall not be great. Or that we will move the Atlantic coast out to Chicago and we will move Chicago down to the Gulf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. ENGLAND. May I have 10 minutes longer?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for 10 minutes more.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Mr. ENGLAND. The Wall Street Journal has an editorial in the issue of February 10, 1928, under the caption of "Political rate making," which is of unusual interest to all who deal in commodities other than money and speculative securities.

Referring to the Robinson resolution which was adopted by the Senate on Thursday, February 9, 1928, by a vote of 68 to 1, it says:

When Congress creates a tribunal for the particular purpose of adjudicating private controversies and then attempts to interfere with the exercise of its informed and conscientious judgment, the least that can be said of the lawmakers is that they are poor sports. A much worse epithet might justifiably be used.

This is saying that when Congress enacts a law creating a commission and vests in that commission certain powers, the duty of the Congress is at an end, that it has no business to keep an eye on its creature or to pass upon its activities. Congress is made up of "poor sports," even worse, if it presumes to take notice of how its act, the statute, is being construed by the commission created to enforce it. The Senate is chided, unabashed, for even seeking information as to whether or not its interest in service to the people, as expressed in the law, is being carried out.

Referring to the Lake Cargo Coal Rate case, the defender of the Wall Street interests says:

Senator ROBINSON'S resolution was frankly aimed at the lake cargo coal rate situation, now pending before the commission for decision. Last summer the commission increased the spread between rates from the northern and southern fields to the lower lake ports from 40 to 60 cents a ton by reducing the northern rates 20 cents. This action may or may not have been sound. A minority of the commission opposed it as an effort to assist the northern operators to overcome the handicap of higher wages and more expensive mining conditions as an arbitrary interference with the play of natural and economic forces. The majority justified it as a recognition of relative railroad operating costs and as the making of a rate reasonable in itself.

This statement indicates that the writer of the editorial never read the opinion of either the majority or the minority, for it is evident from the opinion of the majority itself that it was intended, as stated by the minority, "to assist the northern operators to overcome the handicap of higher wages and more expensive mining conditions."

The Senate resolution simply calls upon the commission to report whether or not it construes the statutes as conferring upon it that power, the power to equalize industrial advantages, and, if so, to point out that part of the law which it so construes gives to the commission that power and authority.

The Senate evidently had in mind a clarification of the law, based upon whatever report the commission may make.

Again, the editorial says:

When railroads serving only the southern fields filed tariffs reducing their rates 20 cents the commission suspended their effectiveness pending investigation, which has not been concluded. A lot of nonsense has been talked about the action of the commission having cost coal consumers of the Northwest millions of dollars. It has, of course, done nothing of the sort. The question is merely whether the southern mine operators or the railroads serving them shall give up 20 cents a ton. One or the other will do it, since the southern producers will not retire from the lake trade. The only certain thing is that the consumers of the coal will not get the 20 cents.

Here the writer shows abysmal ignorance of the record in the Lake Cargo case or a willful intention to misrepresent the facts. The evidence of all parties, uncontradicted, was to the effect that before the reduction of the 20 cents in the northern rates, under the differential in effect since 1917, the lake coal market was the most keenly competitive coal market in this country, so keenly competitive that only a few cents difference in price was sufficient to switch contracts from one of these competing coal fields to the other. A sudden additional rate advantage of 20 cents a ton given to the northern fields puts them in a position to monopolize the market, for the southern producer, according to the uncontradicted evidence, had so reduced their prices that they were already selling, without profit or at a loss, and it was impossible for them to reduce further their prices. To monopolize the markets the northern operators had only to pass on to the consumer a few cents out of the 20 cents bonus and keep the balance.

The reduction in rates voluntarily made by the railroads serving the southern fields, which they were not only abundantly able to make but which they had to make in order to preserve their tonnage and revenues, placed the competing fields on the old basis of competition. The inevitable results would have been the lowering of coal prices, from all the fields, the full 20 cents a ton, a direct boon to the coal consumers in the Northwest. It is utter bosh to say, as this editorial does, that the coal consumer will not get the 20 cents. It could not be otherwise under the keenly competitive conditions existing.

In the recent Minneapolis hearings, consumers representing almost half of the lake cargo shipments testified that any reduction in freight rates accorded by the carriers and made operative by the commission would be reflected in the selling price of coal to the consumer. The sale price of coal in the northwestern market is determined by the price at the mine plus the freight rate. Any reduction in the freight rate, of course, is reflected in the price paid by the consumer. These consumers representing the copper, salt, cement, coke, paper, and public utility interests are more likely to know what will redound to their interest than the editorial writer of the Wall Street Journal whose main interest is the welfare of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and the other producers of that preferred and privileged district and not the interest of the consumer, industrial or domestic, in the Northwest.

The Wall Street Journal is a devoted friend of the great financial and commercial interests that dominate the coal industry of the North. It has ever been solicitous about the welfare of the great interests that thrive in western Pennsylvania. There is a golden link that binds the mouthpiece of Wall Street to the Pittsburgh group. It believes that it was an economic blunder to develop the mines of West Virginia and the other southern districts and every decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission that increases the freight-rate advantages of the Pittsburgh district over the southern group of shippers meets with the applause of the Wall Street Journal.

It attempts in this editorial to say that the Congress is repenting the adoption of the Hoch-Smith resolution. That resolution, approved January 30, 1925, did not give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power and authority to divest one producing district of the markets it had gained and restore these lost markets to the inefficient producer that formerly dominated these same markets; it did not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission power and authority to say to the consumer of the Northwest that he should not purchase his coal except in those producing markets favored by the commission and it did not give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power and authority to crush free and open competition and establish artificial monopolies under the guise of rate making and rate regulation.

The Hoch-Smith resolution was plainly an instrumentality to require the commission to give consideration to the plight of the farmer; to require the commission to investigate the rate structure under which different kinds of commodities were moving; to ascertain if one class of commodities was being moved or transported at rates that were discriminatory when compared with another class of commodities and to require the commission to make proper adjustments. The Hoch-Smith resolution never gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission such powers as it has assumed to strangle established industry or to build a favored community at the expense of a less favored community to suit the whims of a majority of the commission.

When the Hoch-Smith resolution was adopted by the Congress it was believed by those who were instrumental in securing its adoption that it would inure to the benefit of the farmer. The agricultural element of our population was asking for relief. They needed it. Prices for farm products were at a level that demanded consideration of the conditions confronted by the rural resident. The language of the resolution itself is an admission of the depression that existed in agriculture and the commission was directed in specific language to effect with the least practicable delay such changes in the rate structure as would promote freedom of movement of farm commodities.

Mr. Chairman, it is a far stretch of the imagination when the Wall Street defender of the Interstate Commerce Commission invokes the Hoch-Smith resolution as a responsible instrumentality for the policy of the rate tribunal to allocate the commerce of the Nation to favored communities or sections. This resolution was adopted in 1925, but prior to that time we find that the Interstate Commerce Commission had launched its policy of favoritism. Coal has not been the only commodity over which the commission has assumed jurisdiction and has arrogated to itself the powers of a special providence. Other sections producing other commodities, including fuel and foodstuffs, have suffered from these policies, the exercise of which are not even vested in the Congress, the creator of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

West Virginia, Mr. Chairman, is sick and tired of this mock rate regulation. Since 1912 the Interstate Commerce Commission has increased the freight-rate advantages of the Pittsburgh district 400 per cent over the mines of my district. They are not yet satisfied and threaten to ask additional increases. It is time to call a halt on any agency that uses its vast power to injure one district in order to extend greater advantages to a competing district. The Pittsburgh district claims to have been injured by freight rates that are higher from competing districts than from the Pittsburgh district. I am unable to comprehend how any shipper can be injured by a freight rate that is lower than the rate of his competitor. The omniscience of the majority of the Interstate Commerce Commission must be great, indeed. It has been the only body of trained mathematical experts that has been convinced and admits that lower freight rates possessed by a shipper are resulting in his loss of business.

I do not want to be understood in this address as impugning the integrity of the Interstate Commerce Commission; I am merely attacking the rate-making policy of the commission which is unsound and wholly unjustified under the present law. The history of the rate-making by the commission has been to favor one section to the detriment of another. This fact I do not believe will be questioned. Hon. John J. Esch, former chairman of the commission, is quoted as saying on November 5, 1927, as follows:

> One of the objects of making such reduction was to increase the differential as between these fields (that is, Pennsylvania and Ohio) and the fields of southern West Virginia, Virginia, eastern Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Why increase such differentials and punish the southern producers of coal? They have had an immense outlay of money in the way of properly equipping their mines with modern machinery in order to overcome, if possible, these outrageous differentials.

We are told that these operators and their miners must be penalized for their aggressiveness, and perhaps on account of the superiority of the coal in this southern territory.

Senator WILLIS, of Ohio, states in substance that such artificial aid was necessary in order that the Ohio mines might compete with this southern territory in the Lake cargo market. He is quoted as saying on November 14, 1927, as follows:

> I live in a town through which three trunk lines of railroad pass. For years I saw great trains of coal pass through this town for the Lake trade, with the knowledge that probably not one-tenth of that coal was mined in the State of Ohio. The chief reason was the very unfair advantage given to the coal producers of Kentucky and West Virginia.
> The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Lake Cargo case has, to some extent, mitigated the unfortunate and unfavorable circumstances by which we have been surrounded in Ohio.

He says—

> The unfair advantage given to the coal producers of Kentucky and West Virginia has operated against the coal producers of his State.

This, indeed, is an astounding statement in the face of the history of this case.

Fixing a wide differential in favor of his State to the disadvantage of Lake cargo shipments of the coal producers of Kentucky and West Virginia is the disadvantage to which Senator WILLIS refers.

If the commission under a fair and reasonable interpretation of the statute has the power to regulate rates to build up one section to the destruction of another, then Congress should clarify the laws under which it derives such powers, so that its rate-making policy will be confined to the reasonableness of the rate.

If the commission does not possess such authority—and I do not think it does under the present laws—then it should be required to readjust its rate making in compliance with a proper construction of the existing laws or a commission should be procured that will have a rate-making policy in accordance with the law and rules of reason. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to discuss briefly and in a general way a question about which I am much concerned and which, to my mind, is the outstanding problem that the statesmanship of this Congress is called upon to solve—the question of flood control.

In 1927 the Father of Waters, whose giant arms reach to the crest of the Alleghenies on the east and into the very heart of the Rockies on the west, including within their embrace approximately one-half of the Nation's land area, gathered together the waters from this vast territory and from the Canadian snows of the Northwest, hurled them in torrents toward the great trunk line to make the most gigantic flood yet recorded in the Mississippi Valley. In this immensity of aggregated waters the Nation stood appalled as the terrible destruction of life and property assumed proportions hitherto unparalleled.

Territory greater in area than that of all New England, the most fertile farm lands of the Nation, developed through generations of toil and at a staggering expense in money, was inundated, many lives were lost, homes swept away, millions in property destroyed, the telephone and telegraph rendered useless, trains on 3,000 miles of railroad were stopped, interstate commerce suspended, postal roads ruined, mails delayed, industry paralyzed, and misery and poverty visited upon thousands of once happy and prosperous homes.

It was a staggering blow to the whole country, and was so far-reaching in effect as to demonstrate to the business interests of the country and the general public that flood control in the Mississippi Valley is national in scope and that it is a problem of Federal responsibility.

The Secretary of Agriculture in his annual report states that it is his conviction that—

> Prevention of future disastrous floods is an imperative national problem.

In the report of the Secretary of War for 1927 he says:

> By far the most important of the flood-control projects under the War Department is that relating to the Mississippi River and its tributaries. The control of floods on the Mississippi River involved interstate problems of such magnitude that the Federal Government was inevitably drawn into the matter. Waters from 31 States and the Provinces of Canada put into the Mississippi. Were it not for the protecting levees the higher floods would overflow about 30,000 square miles of the rich alluvial bottom, a territorial area greater than that of many of our States.
> Under conditions which prevailed in the early stages of the settlement of the Mississippi Valley the overflowed area was not covered to any great depth with water, as the floods were free to spread out on all sides. As the country became more settled and more populous, however, the people of the valley undertook the building of protecting dikes or levees in order to keep their lands free from overflow. As greater and greater areas were protected by levees the consequent restriction of the flood waters necessarily resulted in higher water levels. This in turn called for higher and stronger levees. The local interests continued the unequal struggle to the limit of their resources. Their aggregate expenditures before receiving any assistance from the Federal Government were over $100,000,000.

In 1879 the United States took formal cognizance of the gravity of the situation and of the national interests involved by the organization of the Mississippi River Commission. Since that year the Federal Government has participated in the cost of the work—to a greater extent during the past 10 years than was formerly the case. * * * It is now evident that the country is faced with the necessity of adopting a new and enlarged project for flood control on the Mississippi River with a broader conception of the national interest in the problem.

General Jadwin in his report says:

The control of the Mississippi River has developed from a local problem to a national problem.

The Secretary of Commerce in his report to the President at Rapid City, S. Dak., in July, 1927, says:

There is no question that the Mississippi River can be controlled if a bold and proper engineering plan is developed. It is not possible for the country to contemplate the constant jeopardy which now exists to 1,500,000 of its citizens or the stupendous losses which the lack of adequate control periodically brings about. Furthermore, flood control means the secure development of some 20,000,000 acres of land capable of supporting five to ten millions of Americans. The costs of such work, if spread over 10 years, would be an inconsiderable burden upon the country. It is not incompatible with national economy to prevent $10 of economic loss by the expenditure of $1 of Federal outlay. In the face of their great losses and their present destitution I do not see how the people along the river can contribute much more than the maintenance of the central works after they have been constructed.

In an article appearing in the Magazine of Business, November, 1927, he is quoted as saying:

Adequate flood control is bound to be a national problem. One of our first obligations is the development of a comprehensive plan for the permanent solution of this problem and to provide funds for its execution.

In an address before the Mississippi Valley Association at St. Louis, Mo., in November, 1927, he said in part:

The most important event in our national life during the past year has been one which bears directly upon the development and control of our great rivers; that is, the Mississippi flood. Sad and heartrending as it has been in its human aspects, severe and discouraging as have been the economic losses, it at least serves to bring home to the American people the increasing dangers to a growing population which lurk in our great streams if they be not adequately controlled.

I have little need to dwell upon the causes of the great flood and its destruction. But there is an aspect of the flood that has, perhaps, not been sufficiently emphasized. The destructivity of this flood was partly due to the rapidly increasing settlement of the flood area. This increase will continue, and such dangers to our country will increase as the years go on unless we establish adequate controls. The great Delta of the Mississippi River, which in reality extends from Cairo to the Gulf, has been for untold centuries the spillway for our interior rivers. They spread their annual floods over these richest of alluvial lands for 1,000 miles long and from 20 to 150 miles wide. With the pressure of population our people have, more especially in the past quarter of a century, invaded the flood region. With courage and resolution they have overcome the swamp and forest; they have converted it into homes and productive farms. And in so doing they have forced the river in flood time to confine itself to its own channel.

I need not recount to you that with the unprecedented volume of water of this year these barriers crumpled up and the river spread itself again over its old flood area. Some 750,000 of our people were compelled to flee their homes in jeopardy of their lives. Damage to their farms and villages amounted to hundreds of millions.

Such a flood 25 years ago would have wrought far less destruction, simply because there were fewer people and less property in its track. If we look into the future but a quarter of a century, we can envisage even far greater dangers than those past. We may not have so great a flood again for many years to come. But the richness of these soils and the pressure of our growing people will some day see 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 of them settled under these levees. No one can contemplate these millions of our fellow citizens living in such jeopardy without adequate and final protection.

I believe the whole of the United States is unanimous in that we must undertake some engineering works as will give security, not only now but for the future. Our people have arrived at this conclusion because of their warm sympathy for the welfare of their fellow citizens. But viewed from the more narrow point of view, the destruction of property is the loss of the entire Nation; it is not solely the loss of individual sufferers. The loss of several millions of acres of crops in this flood deprived the American people of just that much goods which they might have otherwise consumed or exported, and again, every worker and every farmer in our country to some degree was a loser through the decreased buying power of flood sufferers themselves. Every investor in railways and industry in the South lost something.

I am sure President Coolidge wants to be fair and is sincere in his desire to see ample protection accorded the people in the Mississippi Valley, but he places a false construction upon the question when he refers to flood control in this great territory as a reclamation problem. In his message to Congress he said:

It is the land of this region that is to be benefited. To say that it is unable to bear any expense of reclamation is the same thing as saying that it is not worth reclaiming.

The major portion of this territory has long since been reclaimed. Through the untiring efforts and undaunted courage of these patriotic people, and at an enormous expense, this great valley has been developed into the greatest agricultural and food-producing section of the Nation.

Perhaps the Panama Canal represents the crowning glory of American engineering skill. Yet I doubt if that achievement demanded larger heroism and tenacity of purpose, the exercise of greater determination to triumph over nature in the face of almost insuperable obstacles, more patience and endurance, than has the conquest of the region of which we speak and in which our people work and live. Through their efforts it became a veritable paradise whose cities, towns, hamlets, and homes were beehives of hospitality; rich with the honeycombs of smiles and welcomes. A land fanned by the balmy zephyrs of southern seas, clothed with the gorgeous sheen of the most fragrant flowers, and vocal with the silvery melody of nature's choicest songsters. But the floods came destroying the achievements of a century and leaving in its wake death, destruction, and despair. To control these floods is not to reclaim but to protect that which we have already developed. The Mississippi River and its tributaries are national assets, Government owned and Government controlled. Why should not the expenses be a Government responsibility?

As a matter of common defense it is essential that this great valley be protected from the ravages of destructive floods. Its people have never shirked responsibility or failed to respond when duty called. In times of peace it has been one of the greatest wealth-producing and food-producing sections of the country.

In times of war it has furnished man power and fed the armies. When the call was made in the World War the boys from the farm, the workshop, and the factory, from every section of the Nation responded. Upon the battle fields of France they turned apparent defeat into victory for the allied armies and won the plaudits of the world.

Had America's greatest peace time disaster, the 1927 flood, befallen us at some critical period during that great war how different would have been the story, how changed might have been the results, of what magnitude might have been the perils of this Republic. The war demonstrated to the country how essential it is to our general welfare that this great valley be protected. The flood demonstrated to us the great dangers and the false sense of security under which we had labored in the past. If commerce is to be encouraged, the general welfare of the country promoted, if we are to provide for our common defense and human life is to be preserved, the Federal Government should no longer delay in assuming its full responsibility in flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

It is to be hoped that the ardor manifested by the great leaders of the country in their expressions as the floods subsided, revealing its path of destruction and desolation, may not have weakened with the lapse of time. Let there be no further delay. The people of the valley are in suspense. Faith in Congress is the only thing that is preserving the morale. Let us meet the responsibility and meet it quickly. The whole country will approve our action. Flood control is a problem to be wrestled with by experts, but may I make this suggestion: That whatever plan may be adopted it should be broad enough in scope as to include the tributaries; complete protection can not be afforded otherwise and justice can not be met with less.

Before concluding I want to register my protest against the Jadwin plan as applied to southeast Missouri. Section 125, page 29, of the Jadwin report on flood control, as transmitted by the President of the United States in his message of December 8, 1927, together with a letter from the Secretary of War, provides as a part of said plan to create a flood way in southeast Missouri, in New Madrid and Mississippi Counties, by setting back about 5 miles of the west bank of the Mississippi River levee from Birds Point, opposite Cairo, to St. Johns Bayou, just east of New Madrid, a distance of 70 miles by river below Cairo, to lower the present river bank levee to the extent of 5 feet, and including in said flood way approximately 160,000 acres of the best agricultural land in southeast Missouri, perhaps three-fourths of which is under cultivation, a greater portion thereof held by small landowners, the same being in a high state of cultivation, and having been developed by a remarkable drainage system, constructed by the people of that community at their own expense, and in which the savings of a lifetime in developing farms and building homes have been expended. In carrying out this program it is intended to protect the people of the city of Cairo, Ill. According to many engineers of experience, such a program would be of little, and, perhaps, no protection to Cairo, and would only tend to lull the people of that city into a false sense of security. Of course, we all want to protect Cairo, but we believe that American engineering skill can develop a plan just as economical, that will protect Cairo and save southeast Missouri.

The lands in southeast Missouri affected by this plan carry a heavy bonded indebtedness for drainage and levee purposes, which, with the mortgage indebtedness thereon, have almost, if not quite, reached the point of confiscation. The total bonds and coupons issued in New Madrid County for drainage and levee purposes amount to $7,488,487.33. The total amount in Mississippi County is $3,681,909.67. The total for the nine counties in southeast Missouri affected by the flood is $54,536,142.19. The total amount of bonds paid up to July 1, 1927, was $9,017,814.19. Total amount of coupons paid was $14,069,716.37. Bonds unpaid, $21,113,594.14. Coupons unpaid, $10,335,107.49. The total property damage, as estimated by the Mississippi Flood Control Association as a result of the flood of 1927, was as follows:

Mississippi County	$515,500
New Madrid County	802,078
The total for the nine counties affected was	7,091,265

In addition to the indebtedness above referred to these counties have a large outstanding bonded indebtedness created for the purpose of building roads and the damages to the roads that had been constructed in this territory was enormous. A heavy mortgage indebtedness also exists in this territory as is true of all farming sections throughout the country. The interest installments on the bonds of many of the improvement districts in the flood territory are delinquent. Taxes on much of the land involved are delinquent and to impose additional taxes, or other financial obligations, on the local communities that have been the victims of floods from navigable-controlled streams and thereby rendered unable to pay past due interest installments on bonds and delinquent taxes would be an outrage.

Great drainage projects have been undertaken and completed by the people of southeast Missouri at their own expense; in fact, we find in this territory one of the greatest drainage systems in America. The proposed plan would obstruct the outlets for a number of the canals which have been constructed and destroy to a great extent the system heretofore completed. It has been estimated by competent engineers that it would cost approximately $1,500,000 to make the necessary changes in the drainage system in southeast Missouri should the Jadwin plan be carried out. This additional burden would be imposed upon these unfortunate people. According to the proposed plan the local districts in southeast Missouri would be required to furnish the right of way for the new levee proposed, cut down the old levee to the extent of 5 feet, all at their own expense, pay all damages that might result from the prosecution of the plan, and pay 20 per cent of the cost of construction of all new levees. Local communities are unable financially to consider such a proposition. Not only that, it is glaringly unfair.

In a letter by Mr. M. G. Barnes, chief engineer Illinois waterway construction, directed to Hon. William F. Mulvihill, supervisor Illinois waterway construction, Mr. Barnes says with reference to the Jadwin plan as applied to southeast Missouri:

> It has been estimated that the setting back of these levees will cost upwards of $20,000,000. If local authorities are to pay the cost, what local authorities shall it be—the State of Illinois, which is directly benefited by such action, but is not in any way damaged by the setting back of the levees, or shall the cost be assumed by the State of Missouri, where the taking of land and damaging of other land occurs? The proposed expenditure is for the benefit of Illinois and the damage is in the State of Missouri. Illinois may well set up in court that it should not pay for this damage, inasmuch as her rights were originally encroached upon and this new action is, in a measure, an attempt to remedy the damage already done. Missouri, on the other hand, may say that the remedy does great damage to the interests of her people and does not benefit them, and moreover they may set up that some other remedy may protect Illinois citizens at a lower cost. * * *

I might say that if this plan were carried into execution a vast territory in southeast Missouri, west of the proposed new levee, would be left in as unfortunate, if not in a more perilous condition, than it is to-day. I speak of the territory in the St. Francis and Black River Basin. According to the report of the Mississippi Flood Control Association the property damage to Dunklin County alone in this basin, by reason of the 1927 floods, amounted to $3,078,910. In Butler County the estimated damage was $271,300. In Stoddard County $1,985,350. Their levees are broken and destroyed. Bonds can not be sold for future protection. Many schools are closed. Nine successive floods visited these people in 1927, and it is difficult to picture the deplorable situation that exists. Local communities have continued the unequal struggle to the limit of their resources and to the point of exhaustion. Any plan that is adopted should provide for the protection of this basin.

The counties in southeast Missouri affected by the floods are in as high a state of development as any section of the country, densely populated, filled with schools and churches, interlaced with railroads and has perhaps more mileage of State and Federal highways than any other farming section of its size in the Mississippi Valley. Conditions in this territory are illustrative of what is true of many tributaries and demonstrates that the great trunk-line waterway and its tributaries should be considered as one vast flood-control problem.

As suggested in the beginning it is one of the greatest problems that confronts us. It offers an opportunity for the engineering profession to demonstrate man's ability to do a vaster work in conquering the forces of nature than has heretofore been accomplished. Somewhere a genius is waiting, and when Congress acts, and it should act quickly, another Goethals will be found to guide the engineering skill of America to a successful solution of this great problem. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia, and other activities chargeable in whole or in part, against the revenues of such District, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10635. An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10635), making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10035), making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MADDEN, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. BYRNS.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9280. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.; and

H. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June-July, 1928, and providing for an appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the expenses of the delegates.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. LAMPERT, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. SCHNEIDER), was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of illness in his family.

SPEECH OF THE LATE HON. CHAMP CLARK

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to do what others of my colleagues have done—printing as a part of my remarks an address delivered by Champ Clark, then Speaker of this House, at the Washington Press Club, to the newly elected Members of Congress on March 16, 1916. This speech was printed the next day in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as extension of remarks by Hon. THOMAS BELL, of Georgia, who has himself been a Member of this House 24 years. It has been reprinted by other Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to have reprinted in an extension of remarks a speech made by former Speaker Champ Clark. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

THE MAKING OF A REPRESENTATIVE

REMARKS OF CHAMP CLARK AT THE WASHINGTON PRESS CLUB RECEPTION, THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1916

[Printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 17, 1916]

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph, of Roanoke, in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "top-notchers."

Let us take the present House and see how long the men who hold the high places have served. I can not name all, but will cite a few as samples.

Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year. He holds the record, or, in pugilistic parlance, "he holds the belt," for length of service in the House in our entire history. In several Congresses he was chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations and then was Speaker eight years, only one man—Henry Clay—having been Speaker longer.

I am serving my twenty-second year; Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Kitchin, chairman of Ways and Means, his sixteenth; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs and "father of the House," his twenty-sixth; Mr. Flood, chairman of Foreign Affairs, his sixteenth; Mr. Hay, chairman of Military Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. GLASS, chairman of Banking and Currency, his sixteenth; Mr. Adamson, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, his twentieth; Mr. Stephens, chairman of Indian Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Slayden, chairman of the Library, his twentieth; Mr. Henry, chairman of Rules, his twentieth; Mr. Lever, chairman of Agriculture, his sixteenth; Mr. Padgett, chairman of the Navy, his sixteenth; Mr. Lloyd, chairman of Accounts, his twentieth; and Mr. Sparkman, chairman of Rivers and Harbors, his twenty-second. There are other big chairmanships, but these will suffice to show that as a rule the big places go to old and experienced Members, for most of the men who rank close to the chairmen are old timers. The same thing holds good with reference to members of the minority. As an illustration, Messrs. GILLETT and COOPER, who are serving their twenty-fourth year, are the ranking Republicans on Appropriations and Foreign Affairs, almost certain to be chairmen thereof should the Republicans ever again have a majority in the House, as in that event, in all probability, Mr. Mann will be Speaker, unless he is nominated for President next June.

Go through the whole list and you will find, with few exceptions, that the men of long service have the high places.

New England and the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have understood the value of long service all along, and, having elected a fairly good man to Congress, they keep him in the harness.

The Member of longest consecutive service is called "the father of the House." Five Philadelphians in immediate succession bore that honorable title—Randall, Kelley, O'Neill, Harmer, and Bingham. Then it went to Mr. Dalzell, of Pittsburgh. When General Bingham announced the death of General Harmer, his immediate predecessor as "the father of the House," he stated that the five Philadelphia "fathers of the House" had served a total of 147 years, and he served 8 or 10 years after making that interesting statement.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men—Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

I can speak freely on the subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them!

One other thing. I do not know what committee assignments you new Members secured. If they are good, you are to be congratulated. If bad, do not be cast down. No congressional tenderfoot ever had poorer assignments than I had—Claims and Old Pensions—but I never complained or kicked. I went to work as though those committees suited me exactly. Here is an illustration of what may happen and how luck plays an important part. I was next to top Democrat on both Foreign Affairs and Patents for eight years—never advanced a peg so far as committees went. Just when, at the beginning of the ninth year on those two committees, I was about to become top Democrat on Foreign Affairs, Hon. John Sharp Williams, then minority leader, assigned me to the foot of Ways and Means, and at the end of four years, through the happenings of politics in five different States, I jumped from the foot to the head of the Democratic minority on Ways and Means. So it may be with you. Events over which you have no control may advance you more rapidly than you dream of or hope for. My advice is this: "Whatever your hands find to do, do it with your might."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, H. R. 11133, be limited to two hours and a half, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] and 30 minutes to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill be limited to two hours and a half, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and 30 minutes to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1928

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Joseph R. Sizoo, D. D., pastor of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, in the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, God of the ages, our God, we thank Thee that in times of crises when the resources of man shrivel the resources of God unfold. On this day of days we pause to acknowledge again that guidance in the affairs of our lives.

We bless Thee for the heritage of one whom we have always called the Father of our Country. We can not exalt him always above praise or blame, but we can exalt ourselves by living out the forces he set in motion. Unto that end give us courage in waiting and patience by all high resolves, so that through our efforts Thy kingdom may come, prosperity may abound, and peace may be established in the world. And unto Thee, O illimitable love, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, shall we give all the praise. World without end. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

To the people of the United States:

Friends and fellow citizens, the period for a new election of a citizen to administer the Executive Government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office of which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications. experiences, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes..

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head: they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secured to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigating by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1928

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Almighty God, that our highest human happiness is the wonderful privilege of entering into the joy of the Lord! Through Thee the pillars of the eternal world are made firm and the earth is stirred with a melody unheard before! We pray for that strength that shall cause our inner natures to grow into stalwart dimensions. Thou has crowned us with honor and glory and given us a responsibility in the moral sovereignty of the world. With all the grasp of our mortal strength may we be alive to the calls and claims of our day. O God, a rich sentiment has set this hour apart. We pause to pay worthy tribute to him whose dust sleeps upon the banks of the historic Potomac. A Republic undergirded by the best blood and overarched by Thy Providence adjourns in memory of him who was great in righteous war and magnanimous in peace. He lives at the very foundation of our Government, at the firesides of our land, and in the grateful hearts of his countrymen. May the story of his sacrifice, of his chivalry, of his lofty sense of right and justice live on and on to bless and inspire the coming generations of men. In the name of the world's Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

SENATE

THURSDAY, February 23, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, whose nature and property is ever to have mercy and to forgive, receive our humble petition; and though we be tied and bound with the chain of our sins, yet let the pitifulness of Thy great mercy loose us that with pure hearts and minds we may serve Thee without hindrance. And as we here invoke the agency of an impalpable influence, the comradeship of the like-minded, the example of our fathers gone before us, grant to us to feel the passion of a high resolve to cherish above all else the glorious destiny unto which Thou hast called us as a nation. Grant this for the sake of Him whose tender love enfolds us, Thy Son, our Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

MOTION-PICTURE REGULATION

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I present memorials from the managers of the following moving-picture theaters: Glen City Theater, Santa Paula; California Theater, Richmond; Million Dollar Theater, Los Angeles; Carthay Circle Theater, Los Angeles; West Coast Theaters (Inc.), Fresno; Loew's State Theater, Los Angeles; St. Francis Theater, San Francisco; Strand Theater, San Francisco; Ritz Theater, Los Angeles, all in the State of California, protesting against the passage of the so-called Brookhart bill, S. 1667.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In connection with the memorials just presented, I hold in my hand an editorial from the Los Angeles Examiner concerning the proposed measure of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. It is respectful and thoughtful; I think it will be interesting to Senators. I request that this editorial, which advances reasons why this bill should not pass, be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner, February 15, 1928]

PICTURE REGULATION MEASURE IS NOT NEEDED BY INDUSTRY

The motion-picture industry is not ripe for Government regulations, as provided in the Brookhart bill before the Senate.

There is no monopoly and no danger of monopoly in the production, distribution, or exhibition of pictures. It is throughout a highly competitive business which threatens the public with no extortions.

Moreover, it is a fast-developing business which needs to be free of the shackles of Government supervision.

The Brookhart bill, to meet alleged abuses in the trade, prohibits "block booking" and "blind booking."

It forbids producers showing pictures first in their own theaters. Each picture in each town must be auctioned off to the highest bidder.

The bill directs the Federal Trade Commission to decide disputes as to prices, etc., and (sec. 8) it forbids anybody in the industry to violate any regulation made by the Federal Trade Commission.

No competitive industry in the United States is subject to any such drastic regulation by the Federal power. The American theory of government is for Government to keep its hands off except in cases where competition fails to protect the public.

In this case complaint is not made on behalf of the public, but on behalf of certain independent exhibitors.

It is claimed that block booking, wholesale purchase of a run of pictures, binds the exhibitor to buy inferior stuff in order to get the big hit. Any abuse in this direction is being eliminated by the industry itself. Block booking enables the theater to plan and advertise ahead with certainty, and it greatly decreases the cost of selling films.

Blind booking, buying pictures unseen and unmade, is nothing but selling ahead for future delivery, a practice universal with every leading business in the country. To abolish forward contracts would hurt independent producers more than the so-called affiliated interests.

Such contracts are the basis of the bank loans with which the independents meet their pay rolls. There are plenty of these independent producers, just as there are thousands of independent exhibitors.

The most unfair part of the bill is its attempt to deny producers the right to choose their exhibitors—for example, to prefer the theaters they own. It is an effort to set back the clock of economic progress by refusing to this one group of manufacturers the right to sell direct to the public.

The Brookhart bill would introduce expense and confusion into film distribution by forbidding the long-term contracts on which business is done. It would make production more uncertain and costly. Fewer films would be produced if none could be sold until completed—that is, if there could be no blind booking.

Finally, Government disapproval of our film industry would give foreign governments a fine new excuse to handicap American films by discriminatory legislation.

The Brookhart bill should not pass. It is an ill-considered proposal, based on ignorance of the motion-picture business. It will harm instead of help the interests it pretends to protect. It is an un-American interference with a great American industry which has done nothing to deserve this stigma and this handicap at the hands of the Government.

CONTROL OF AIRCRAFT FOR SEACOAST DEFENSE

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 11), as follows:

Whereas the problem of the control of shore-based aircraft intended for coast defense has long been a vexed question; and

Whereas in the airplane we have a truly amphibious instrument of national defense which crosses the coast line at will, and which can not be definitely confined either to the land where the Army is dominant or to the sea where the Navy has paramount interest; and

Whereas there exists the necessity for the establishment of a clear and indisputable line of demarcation between the proper air functions of the Army and those of the Navy, not only in the continental United States but also in the Panama Canal Zone and in the Territories and possessions; and

Whereas the national interest demands that the aeronautical strength of the Nation should always be employed where it will be most effective; and

Whereas the difficulty of reaching any satisfactory solution of this problem through negotiations between the representatives of the Army and Navy has been repeatedly described publicly by high-ranking officials of our armed forces: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of Congress, to consist of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is authorized and directed to make a full investigation of the problem of the control of aircraft for seacoast defense, and to recommend to Congress as soon as practicable such legislation concerning aerial coast defense as it shall deem necessary or proper.

For the purpose of this resolution such committee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $2,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this matter is one which concerns both the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee, and in view of the fact that it is a matter of very great national importance that a decision be reached on these questions which have been going along without proper decision for more than 10 years, I ask that the concurrent resolution may be referred first to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGES

Mr. HAWES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of three bridge bills, which were reported to-day from the Committee on Commerce. They are House bills 6639, 8106, and 8107.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bills will be considered.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the consideration of the bills.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bills in their order.

The bills were severally reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6639) authorizing the Centennial Bridge Co. of Independence, Mo. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Liberty Landing, Clay County, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 8106) authorizing F. C. Barnhill, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Arrow Rock, Saline County, Mo.; and

A bill (H. R. 8107) authorizing Frank M. Burruss, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Miami, Saline County, Mo.

NOMINATIONS FOR EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, to submit three reports from the Foreign Relations Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reports will be received and placed upon the Executive Calendar.

ROBERT W. STEWART—RECUSANT WITNESS

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am advised that the Sergeant at Arms has a privileged report which he desires to submit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS (David S. Barry). Mr. President, I have to report that in the case of Robert W. Stewart, whom I took into custody on a warrant issued by the President of the Senate, Mr. Justice Bailey, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, has denied the writ of habeas corpus for which he applied. Mr. Stewart immediately appealed the case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Sergeant at Arms if the court directed the prisoner to be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms?

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Yes; he was remanded to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms, and then, when he appealed the case, he was immediately released on bond.

Mr. WALSH of Montana subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the opinion of Associate Justice Bailey in the matter of Robert W. Stewart, petitioner.

There being no objection, the opinion and order were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the matter of Robert W. Stewart, petitioner. Habeas corpus No. 1488

It appears that the petitioner, Robert W. Stewart, having been subpœnaed to appear and testify before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, appeared before that committee on February 2 and 3, 1928. He answered certain questions put to him by the committee but declined to answer certain others, and the committee reported his refusal to answer to the Senate.

The Senate thereupon directed that a warrant issue directing the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to take the petitioner into custody and bring him before the bar of the Senate to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as might be propounded to him and to keep him in custody to await the further order of the Senate.

The warrant was issued and executed and the petitioner now claims that he is being unlawfully detained by the respondents, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputy. He rests his claim upon three propositions.

First:

"The Senate is without power to arrest and attach petitioner for the purpose of compelling him to attend as a witness before the Senate when at the time of the arrest the witness was in attendance before the Senate committee under and in obedience to a subpœna issued by it."

If the committee was seeking information as a basis for legislation by Congress and if the questions asked the petitioner were pertinent to such inquiry and did not invade any of his constitutional rights, it was his duty to answer, and his refusal to do so could be treated as an act of contempt of the Senate. The Senate might thereupon have had him attached to be brought before the bar of the Senate to answer for his contempt, as has been done in several cases, but instead took a more lenient course in having him brought before the bar of the Senate to answer such pertinent questions as might be asked him there. There was no question but that he had refused to answer as reported by the committee, and he has no ground to complain that he was to be given an opportunity to purge himself of his contempt by giving his testimony before the Senate instead of being brought before its bar for punishment. The attachment could properly be based on his recalcitrant conduct as a witness before the committee. The Senate is not necessarily controlled by the practice of the courts in similar cases.

Petitioner's second and third propositions are:

"Resolution 101 does not call for information essential for the exercise of the power of legislation, but is an attempt at exercising judicial function, beyond the powers of the Senate, and authorizes an inquiry into the private affairs of individuals."

"Petitioner answered every question put to him of public interest with respect to the disposition of the bonds held by the Continental Trading Co. The questions he refused to answer dealt with private and personal matters, the answers to which could in no way furnish information essential to the efficient performance of any legislative function of the Senate."

Resolution 101 authorizes an investigation supplementary to one theretofore authorized, and of which the committee had made no final report. The former investigation had resulted in legislation directing the prosecution of suits, one of which had resulted in the recovery of valuable property of the Government, and in other legislation, and it may be assumed that the Senate had in mind the possibility of the need of further legislation when the latest resolution was passed. The failure to specify such purpose is not fatal to the inquiry. Where the particular investigation has already formed the basis of legislation, the court will not assume that some particular phase of a later investigation supplementary to the former can not be made for the purpose of legislation and that the Senate is transcending its functions under the Constitution.

The petitioner states that he appeared voluntarily before the committee to give his testimony. He took an oath to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." He raised no general objection to the scope of the inquiry, but after he had proceeded to answer numerous questions he finally refused to answer as to his knowledge of anyone who received the Liberty bonds mentioned in the resolution or whether he had discussed any of the bond transactions with Sinclair, and other questions of similar character. He voluntarily testified in part, but refused to tell the whole truth, and a partial truth may be as misleading as a falsehood. These questions were clearly relevant to the inquiry and involved no question of privilege. They did not involve the private affairs of the witness, and the witness can not make such a claim on behalf of others when he does not appear to be acting in a representative capacity. But even such a ground would not be an excuse for failure to answer questions relevant to any matters which were the subject of proper inquiry.

In my opinion the grounds upon which the petitioner refused to testify were frivolous and without legal bases and his attachment was justified.

The writ of habeas corpus will be discharged and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the respondents.

———— ————, Justice.

In the matter of Robert W. Stewart, petitioner. Habeas corpus No. 1488

ORDER

This cause came on to be heard on the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, the writ issued thereon, the return of the respondents filed herein, and the traverse to return, and upon the said pleadings was argued by counsel for the respective parties and submitted to the court.

Upon consideration whereof, it is by the court this 23d day of February, A. D. 1928, Adjudged and ordered, That said Robert W. Stewart be, and he is hereby, remanded to the custody and control of the respondents and the writ of habeas corpus be, and it is hereby, discharged.

JENNINGS BAILEY,
Associate Justice.

From the foregoing order the petitioner in open court notes an appeal to the court of appeals and the penalty of his bond for costs in said appeal is fixed in the sum of $100, or in lieu of said bond he may deposit the sum of $50 in the clerk's office, and the said Robert W. Stewart is ordered to be admitted to bail in the sum of $5,000 upon his giving bond in the said sum to answer for his appearance in said court of appeals.

REGISTRATION OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OR AGENTS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 145), submitted by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they are hereby, amended by adding a new rule, as follows:

RULE XLI. REGULATION AND REGISTRATION OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OR AGENTS

All persons employed for hire as attorney or agents to represent individuals, partnerships, societies, corporations, or foreign governments, to advocate or oppose pending legislation, shall register the fact of such employment, a statement of the particular legislation, and the name of their employer with the Secretary of the Senate before engaging in such employment.

Upon motion of any Member of the Senate, supported by a majority vote, any designated employee may be summoned to appear before the Committe on Rules and required to give the names of all persons for whom he is employed, or if an employer, the names of those who were employed by him to influence legislation during the current session of Congress and an account of all expenditures incurred or promised for the purpose.

The chairmen of the committees shall require all persons appearing before them to advocate or oppose pending legislation to state whether they are employed for the purpose, and if so, by whom employed. A list of employers so disclosed shall be kept by the committee, and upon motion of any member any designated employer shall be summoned before the committee and required to give the names of all persons employed by him to influence legislation during the current session of Congress, and an account of all expenditures incurred or promised for the purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is chairman of the Committee on Rules, has assured me that the Committee on Rules will have a hearing on the resolution in the very near future and report to the Senate, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO UNEMPLOYMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 147) submitted by Mr. WAGNER on the 15th instant, as follows:

Whereas it is essential to the intelligent conduct of private and public business enterprises, to the proper timing for the inauguration of public works by the Federal Government, and the encouragement of similar undertakings by the States, to the formulation of sound economic policy, and it is prerequisite to the provision of relief against the hardship of unemployment and to the ultimate solution of the unemployment that accurate and all-inclusive statistics of employment and unemployment be had at frequent intervals; and

Whereas it is apparent that the United States is now suffering from a decided growth of unemployment, and no nation-wide statistics of unemployment in the United States are anywhere available;

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor is hereby directed (1) to investigate and compute the extent of unemployment in the United States and make report thereon to the Senate, and together therewith to report the methods and devices whereby the investigation and computation shall have been made; (2) to investigate the method whereby frequent periodic report of the number of unemployed in the United States and permanent statistics thereof may hereafter be had and made available, and make report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over without prejudice.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 156) submitted by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on the 21st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate whether the estimates of immigration quotas, prepared by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor under section 11 of the act approved May 26, 1924, which were transmitted to the Senate by the President, together with two letters of the said Secretaries, on January 3 and 10, 1927, are still unsupported by responsible documentary evidence, as admitted in the second letter in question or in process of revision or improvement, and when in the latter case new figures will reach the Congress, accompanied by adequate and detailed explanation of the method of computation, or otherwise.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have no personal objection to the resolution if the Senator will amend it and put it in usual form, inserting the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I accept the amendment and modify my resolution accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, just a moment. I wonder whether, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, the Senator desires to have the resolution adopted. It seems to be a little unusual to have no consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The chairman of the Committee on Immigration is not here.

Mr. WILLIS. That is just the point. I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to let the resolution go over until the chairman of the committee is here. So far as I know there is no objection to it; but it seems to be a little unusual to adopt a resolution of this kind without the slightest conference with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It never occurred to me, in view of the language of the resolution, that there would be any objection at all. I have not been able to communicate with the chairman of the Committee on Immigration this morning.

Mr. WILLIS. If it would not interrupt the Senator's plan, I suggest as a matter of courtesy that that ought to be done. The proceeding is rather unusual, though not contrary to the rule, of course. It seems to me that the resolution ought to be considered by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the resolution has been going over under the rule for a number of days. It merely requests certain information and it has now been amended by the Senator from Minnesota so as to contain the usual language, "if not incompatible with the public interest." It seems to me that the resolution should be adopted. I can not see how any Senator could have any objection to a resolution asking for information when couched in that language.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not desire to be understood as objecting, but I think it is rather an unusual proceeding to crowd a resolution of this kind through without consideration by the committee or at any rate by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator object?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not like to object. I suggest that the Senator let the resolution go over until the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is here. If he confers with him and there is no objection, it is certainly all right with me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The resolution is not in a position where it can be thrown over on the objection of any one Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The resolution came over from a previous day and is entitled to be considered.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that. I am asking, as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from California, that the Senator from Minnesota let the resolution go over until there can be some conference about it. I do not think there will be any question about its passage.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It seems to be the resolution calls for very important information which the Senate and the Congress should have. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will insist on his right to have the resolution considered.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that last year concerning this subject two letters came to us and the figures contained therein did not agree at all; there was a serious conflict. I assume the purpose of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is to ascertain accurately what the figures are, and to put the material before the Senate. I can see no reason why we should not adopt the resolution and obtain this information, because we must have it if we are to deal intelligently with the problem which is pending before us and before the committee. I am sure that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] would not be at all resentful of the adoption of the resolution, but would be glad to have it adopted in order that the material referred to therein might be available for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not think that any action ought to be taken on this resolution without a challenge being made to the wording in line 7, which implies that the estimates of immigration quotas are "unsupported by responsible documentary evidence." I do not believe that that is the fact or that at any time it has been the fact; so I would not want the resolution to be agreed to without that statement or implication being challenged.

I will say that the national-origins quotas have been the subject of constant study; that we are now advised by the Census Bureau that they are confident of the accuracy of the quotas as last established by their study; and that it is quite incorrect to state that they are "unsupported by documentary evidence" or that they are unsupported by other kinds of evidence; and the letter which is mentioned in the resolution did not make that admission.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Would the Senator be satisfied if the language of the report of the Secretaries of Commerce, Labor, and State that accompany the President's transmittal letter of January 10, 1927, were substituted for the words to which he objects?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have never been satisfied with those letters. The Secretaries of Commerce and Labor and State joined in a letter of transmittal to the President, sending him those national-origins quotas. That letter was sent by the President to the Senate; it expressed no dissatisfaction with the quotas; but a few days later a second message came from the President, asking us to substitute for that letter another letter, in which there was a phrase stating, in substance, that the Secretaries had grave doubt as to the accuracy of the figures. It has never been explained to us how that "grave doubt" happened to arise between the time of the transmittal of the first message of the President and the few days that elapsed before the second message came.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. It seems to me this is a matter of considerable importance. Why does not the Senator from Pennsylvania suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Immigration? It does not seem to me that we can very satisfactorily amend the resolution here on the floor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was looking over the resolution in order to see if we might amend it by certain changes. I see no objection to the Senate having all the facts called for by the resolution.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, no one is objecting to that.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But the language of the resolution, it seems to me, ought to be revised. I would hope if it were referred to the Committee on Immigration that we might be able to report it out within two or three days. Certainly I would make no attempt to delay it in committee. I ask the Senator to let that action be taken on his resolution.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, would the Senator from Pennsylvania have any objection to having the resolution adopted to-day if the words to which he objects were stricken out?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator from Minnesota would modify his resolution by striking out——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask to modify the resolution by striking out in line 7, after the word "are," the words "still unsupported by responsible documentary evidence, as admitted in the second letter in question, or."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would have no objection to the resolution if those words were stricken out.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, let the resolution be read as proposed to be amended, so that we may understand just what we are voting on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the estimates of immigration quotas, prepared by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor under section 11 of the act approved May 26, 1924, which were transmitted to the Senate by the President, together with two letters of the said Secretaries, on January 3 and 10, 1927, are in process of revision or improvement, and when in the latter case new figures will reach the Congress, accompanied by adequate and detailed explanation of the method of computation, or otherwise.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I see no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIS. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution as modified is agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGES

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, this morning there were reported from the Committee on Commerce two bridge bills, being House bill 5501 and House bill 5502. As I have said, they have been favorably reported; there is no objection to them, and I ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5501) authorizing the Hermann Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Hermann, Gasconade County, Mo.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWES. I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the other bill mentioned by me, being House bill 5502.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5502) authorizing the Washington Missouri River Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Washington, Franklin County, Mo.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The Senate will proceed with the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

VAN DORN IRON WORKS CO.

The bill (S. 624) for the relief of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when this bill came up the other day an explanation was asked for and the bill went over, as I recall, on the objection of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] pending the receipt of certain information.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] desired very properly certain information which I have not as yet been able to obtain. I do not want to have the bill considered until I have that information. So I ask that it may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ESTATE OF GEORGE B. SPEARIN

The bill (S. 1678) for the relief of the estate of George B. Spearin, deceased, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill was considered on January 14 and amended.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. MOSES. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LAND IN HERNANDO COUNTY, FLA.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property, located in Hernando County, Fla., known as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, no longer required for plant-introduction purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as the matter referred to in the joint resolution is receiving further consideration, and I have introduced another joint resolution which has been referred to the committee, and I think probably will be acted on favorably by the committee, I think the joint resolution the title of which has just been read had better be placed on the calendar under Rule IX, and I ask that that order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar under Rule IX.

STATE AND FEDERAL COOPERATION IN NAMING HIGHWAYS

The bill (S. 1182) to provide for the naming of certain highways through State and Federal cooperation, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill if it may be discussed and defeated.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Maryland has asked that the bill go over.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSIONS OF TIME UNDER OIL AND GAS PERMITS

The bill (S. 1155) to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that there is on the calendar a House bill dealing with the same subject.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is on the calendar a House bill which has been favorably reported to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of passing the Senate bill, then. The Senator can ask to have the House bill substituted.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask to substitute H. R. 5783, Order of Business No. 321.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before consent is given for the consideration of this bill, I should like to have an explanation of it. Will the Senator from Arizona explain the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be very glad to do so. My desire is to substitute for the Senate bill 1155 House bill 5783, which appears upon the calendar, favorably reported to the Senate, as Order of Business No. 321.

The House bill as it passed the House and the Senate bill as reported to the Senate are identical. The Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys have amended the House bill to provide that——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am not objecting to the substitution. What I am asking the Senator to do is to explain the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time to those who have been engaged in good faith in prospecting for oil and gas upon the public domain when the period of time within which they might discover oil has elapsed without its discovery. The Secretary of the Interior, upon a proper showing, would be authorized to grant a further extension of time to those who have theretofore secured prospecting permits.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It seems to me this is legislation of a pretty far-reaching character, and I feel constrained to object to its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not object. I just want to say a word on the subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will withhold my objection for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the House bill is substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The decision as to whether or not the extension will be granted is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. I will say to the Senator that there are a few cases where men have spent, under the leasing act, hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the time is about to elapse. I know one or two such cases where they are down over 3,000 feet. It seems to me it would be unjust to say to those men, who have been diligent, and have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to drill a well deeper than 3,000 feet, and are perfectly willing to continue to try to develop an oil section there, that that amount of money which they have expended must be thrown away. This bill simply says to the Secretary of the Interior, "If, in your opinion, that lease should be extended, you have the authority under this bill to extend it."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, as the Senator puts the case of a specific instance in which certain facts are supposed to exist, it appeals to any one as being just.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other cases of the same kind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Nevertheless, this bill is drawn in general terms, and permits the Secretary of the Interior to extend these permits not only for the period of two years but for such additional period or periods as he may deem reasonable or necessary. I feel that that is granting very large authority to the Secretary of the Interior; and, upon such information as I now have, I feel constrained to object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin conceived the purpose of the bill I am sure he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Up to this moment I have not been able to see the necessity for making a sweeping change in the existing law, and I shall have to insist upon the objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin maintains his objection, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I was about to say, that if the Senator from Wisconsin had not misconceived the purpose of the bill he would not have objected. Some of us will try to make that purpose somewhat obvious. This bill is to facilitate the prospector who by his courage and labor will bring new supplies of oil and gas within reach of the consumer. This bill would also give to those who seek to develop new deposits or new supplies of oil and gas assurance that they shall have reasonable and necessary time within which to commence or to continue drilling operations.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin withhold his objection until I supplement what the Senator from Arizona has said with just a word?

Under existing law, the period of exploration is a fixed one. It expires, and under existing law there is no power whereby that period may be extended. The result is that a permittee, in determining what his investment shall be and how far he shall go, is confronted with the uncertainty that he may prospect in good faith, he may expend a large sum of money in connection with it, and yet if he fails to discover oil within the period of two years his rights terminate and he must needs lose his entire investment.

Under existing law a prospector must discover oil within two years or his right terminates. He is compelled, in making his investment and in doing exploration work, to go forward with the knowledge that at the end of that period his entire outlay will be lost unless he has discovered oil and is in position to take a lease. That, of necessity, depresses exploration for oil and gas on the public domain.

This bill will give a permittee the assurance that if he proceeds in good faith during the two-year period, invests his money, and does the work required by law he will not necessarily lose the investment upon the expiration of the period if he can convince the Secretary of the Interior that he has proceeded in good faith and has endeavored to comply with the law.

Under the bill now before the Senate the Secretary of the Interior, upon a proper showing, could give the permittee additional time in which to develop the property. Obviously, that assurance will tend to inspire exploration rather than to depress it, as existing law does. The enactment of this bill into law is of immense value to the public generally and the public-land States. It is a splendid piece of legislation. I hope that upon the explanations which have been made the Senator from Wisconsin will see fit to withdraw his objection and allow the bill to pass.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is a matter of great regret to me to be in the position of objecting to legislation which is sponsored and supported by the Senator from New Mexico and the Senators from Arizona and the Senator from Utah. Nevertheless, I feel constrained to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Chair will permit me a very small portion of the time which has been had by others, I simply desire to say that it seems to me this is legislation of a sweeping character. It is not relief legislation, in that it is in broad, general terms; and, pending such time as it will take me to look into the matter, I feel constrained to insist upon my objection.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator; but at this juncture I ask the Secretary to read a letter addressed to my colleague the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] by the Secretary of the Interior indorsing this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 20, 1928.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HAYDEN: December 27, 1927, this department advised that it had no objection to the enactment of H. R. 5783, a bill to grant extensions of time on oil and gas permits for two years, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. You now ask whether this department would object to the following amendment which is proposed to be offered to the bill: "or for such additional period or periods as he may deem reasonable or necessary for the full exploration of the land described in the permit."

The bill as amended would still leave the granting of extensions discretionary with the Secretary, but would permit of extensions in that discretion beyond the period of two years originally specified in the bill.

Such general authority is contained in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1927 (44 Stat. 1348), relating to Executive order Indian reservations, and if Congress desires to give the Secretary this discretionary authority, I have no objection to interpose to the amendment.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to trespass on the rule, so I take it I am not in order until another bill is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is quite right. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

HORACE A. CHOUMARD

The bill (S. 511) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall have to wait, then, until another bill is laid before the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

The bill (S. 1285) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I may claim the floor again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. Take, for example, the State of Arizona, which at this time is not producing oil or gas in large commercial quantities; we hope to do so, and our prospectors and developers require reasonable encouragement. The citizens of Arizona are now being severely penalized and mulcted by oil monopolists, who have recently fixed the price of gasoline higher in Arizona than in any other State of the Union; and if the local dealers in gasoline presume, forsooth, to sell gasoline to consumers at a lower price than the price fixed by the monopolists, or the combination, then such local dealers are arbitrarily cut off from the privilege and right to buy gasoline. The situation in Arizona is so acute and the conditions have been so unjust that I have introduced a resolution, which is now before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, demanding an investigation of the oppressions which these oil monopolists by this combine are imposing upon the people of Arizona.

Many persons believe that under portions of the surface in Arizona, New Mexico, and other States are vast quantities of oil and gas, which the Creator, for the delectation of His children, has placed there. It is not always easy to enlist the requisite capital, as capital is proverbially timid. Capital follows the prospector, and this bill would encourage the prospector.

The only way in which to meet a monopolist is to reduce his price, and when new deposits of oil are brought in we should expect the price to be reduced.

This bill has had the careful consideration of my colleague [Mr. HAYDEN], who for years served on the Public Lands Committee of the House. This bill has been carefully investigated by the House committee and has passed the House of Representatives. This bill is sponsored by Arizona's Representative in Congress [Mr. DOUGLAS], and no more able or sagacious man was ever in Congress.

I ask the Senator to withdraw his opposition.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. I want to ask just a question. I am very much interested in this bill, and would like to hear some further explanation with regard to it. But the arguments advanced by the distinguished Senator from Arizona hardly bear upon this measure. If there should be discovered in the Senator's State the greatest gusher of oil that was ever known in the country, it would not affect the price of oil one cent.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator intend to print that statement? I can not argue with a man who talks that way; we are so far apart we do not conflict.

Mr. McMASTER. If the Senator can not argue with the Senator upon that proposition, if he will examine the report made by the Federal Trade Commission in 1923——

Mr. ASHURST. Do not talk to me about the Federal Trade Commission. I am in no humor to hear anything about it.

Mr. McMASTER. There is no use talking to the Senator about anything, then. Let his bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone over. The clerk will report the first amendment to Senate bill 1285.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Delaware to bear with me for a moment.

This bill was introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], who is absent from the Chamber at the present time. It is simply to carry into effect and accentuate and augment the Smith-Lever Act. It would take care of county agents and home-demonstration agents throughout the country. A general demand has been made for the bill, a hearing was held by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, it has the indorsement of all the farm organizations in the country, and nearly all of the States, acting through their county agents and county courts, have asked for the extension of the Smith-Lever Act, which is embodied in the measure to which the Senator has now objected. The committee had extensive hearings on it and reported it favorably, unanimously, and I really would like to see the bill enacted into law, on behalf of the agriculture of the country.

Mr. BAYARD. This is a very important bill, I agree. It calls for the expenditure of a great deal of money, and I would like to have further opportunity to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2277) relating to giving false information regarding the commission of crime in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2447) for the relief of the stockholders of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1476) for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle and certain other citizens was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2524) for the relief of Josephine Doxey was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURTS

The bill (S. 1094) to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let that go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just a minute. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania to object to any consideration of the measure?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Under the five-minute rule; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is conscious of the fact that that is the only way we can get consideration of it. The bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously, and nobody objects to it who has had any experience in the Federal courts except those representing corporations, and now does the Senator propose to stand here perpetually objecting to consideration?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; but it is my purpose to object to the consideration of the bill when we are working on unobjected bills, as we are at this time.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is just what I want to know, whether it will be the policy of the Senator to object all the time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am not going to try to filibuster against the Senator's bill——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not talking about filibustering.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator listen to me when he asks me a question? This bill is objected to by the American Bar Association——

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to correct the Senator. That is incorrect. The executive committee objected to it, but the Bar Association never had a vote on it. They tried to get one and could not do it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has been objected to by a great throng of lawyers who are familiar with Federal court practice, who object to the judge being reduced to a mere puppet, as they think this will reduce him. They think the bill is very bad policy, and I think it should not be passed until the Senate knows what it is doing.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator himself, on the floor of the Senate, amended it, and the Senate passed it at one time in the language in which it is now before the Senate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not remember that that happened. I will look that up.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator offered an amendment, and the Senate accepted that amendment, and we passed the bill as amended without objection, without a single vote against it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not think it ought to be passed now.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is just what I want to know. The Senator can be powerfully effective, when one objection can kill legislation, and I just want to know if that is to be his policy.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This morning that is my policy.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is to be every time the bill is up?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I reserve the right to change my attitude on it after I have had a chance to look into it.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator one time approved it in this language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

LOUISE A. WOOD

The bill (S. 61) granting an increase of pension to Louise A. Wood was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

RELIEF OF NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS

The bill (S. 150) for the relief of former officers of the United States Naval Reserve force and the United States Marine Corps Reserve, who were erroneously released from active duty and disenrolled at places other than their homes or places of enrollment, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will be very glad to have my friend from California make an explanation of this bill, because I confess that from a casual reading there is not made quite clear the extent to which it would go or what the costs would be to the Government.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I shall ask that the bill may go over until we receive some information from the department, when I hope that the bill may be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 459) for the relief of the city of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2720) for the relief of David McD. Shearer was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MORGAN MILLER

The bill (S. 2737) for the relief of Morgan Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. BLEASE. I would like to have the bill passed, if there is no special objection. The Senator who introduced the bill is temporarily out of the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I make the request that it be temporarily laid aside until he shall return to the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. FERRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, some one made objection to the consideration of Senate bill 2737, and I would like to know what the objection is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recurring to Calendar No. 132, Senate bill 2737? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of this measure.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the Senator from Michigan make a statement in regard to the bill. I have not had time to read the report.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. President, the explanation lies in the report, it seems to me. If I remember correctly, a similar bill was passed in the Sixty-ninth Congress. It has been recommended by the committee that it be passed without amendment. I do not see any objection to it. I do not understand what objection can be raised to it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What is the relief sought, in a word—not a speech, but just a word?

Mr. FERRIS. The report states that—

The claimant, Morgan Miller, sustained injuries on February 3, 1920, while standing in the safety zone waiting for a street car at the corner of Fort Street west and Artillery Avenue, in the city of Detroit, Mich., by being struck by a United States mail truck, which was running at a rapid rate of speed and without lights, it being 6 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m. and quite dark. Mr. Miller's head was badly injured, left shoulder and hip greatly bruised, right knee and ankle wrenched quite severely, and the ligaments badly torn. He was in the hospital about five days and was confined to his bed for three months.

The facts are fully set forth in the following affidavits, which are appended hereto and made a part of this report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rule observed by the Senate, as well as the House, for years in relation to such claims for injury on account of accident, as affecting Government employees, was that the claims were never allowed for more than the salary which the injured person would draw from the Government during the year. I do not know Mr. Miller, and I do not know whether he was earning $3,000 a year or not. I do not think that a man outside the Government service struck by an automobile ought to have better treatment than an employee of the Government who may have received exactly the same injury. Does the Senator know Mr. Miller?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I am not personally acquainted with him.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think he was earning $3,000 a year?

Mr. FERRIS. I accept fully the statements made in the affidavits.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that that was a matter for the consideration of the committee which reported the bill. The fact that the committee has reported the bill makes a prima facie case.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee may not have taken that into consideration.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The rule the Senator from Utah mentions no longer prevails about paying employees a year's salary. They are now compensated under an act which gives them a great deal more than that. The rule since I have been a member of the Committee on Claims is to allow really less than one would be likely to recover in a court, but somewhat approximating the extent of the injuries. The proof shows what was the probable reasonable compensation for the injury received. It is very much less than many other claims for injuries which have gone through the committee and have gone through the Senate since I have been a Member of this body and of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah maintain his objection?

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will not do so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Arkansas about the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the Senator from Arkansas why the bill includes statements like this:

Said Morgan Miller's head was badly injured, left shoulder and hip greatly bruised, right knee and ankle wrenched quite severely, and the ligaments badly torn.

Then it contains the further statement:

He was in the hospital about five days and was confined to his bed for three months, and as a result of the accident became almost totally incapacitated and has been since that time dependent upon relatives and friends for support.

That is not legislation; it is a recital of facts. Why does that language appear in the bill itself and not in the report?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure I do not know why. Of course, it is a pleading of the evidence. I am not recommending the bill for a model of bills of this kind; but since it contains the information that $3,000 is to be paid to Morgan Miller for an unjustifiable injury which he suffered, and that sum was thought to be reasonable, therefore I thought we would not quibble about the language. I would not have drawn it in that form.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does not the Senator think we ought to quibble about the language? This is going into the statutes to be there for a considerable time.

Mr. CARAWAY. If we were to appoint a committee on style for the statutes it would be the busiest committee the Senate has ever had. There are bills among those which I introduce which would need revision, and I rarely see one introduced by others that I could not improve on. I hardly believe the Government of the United States can afford to say that while this man had this injury, yet we are not going to pay him because the bill was inelegantly drawn.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If that is the only alternative which occurs to the Senator I am going to suggest another one by proposing to amend the bill by striking out all of the unnecessary language.

Mr. CARAWAY. That will suit us. If the Senator from Utah will not object, we can strike out the language which has been called to our attention by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from what the chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the House advised me yesterday I do not think there could be any danger in allowing it to pass the Senate in any form. I will withdraw my objection. I do want to say, however, that it does seem to me useless to keep on passing these bills year in and year out, flooding the committee of the House with bills when they never report them out. We ought, it seems to me, to reach some kind of rule like the House has reached as to these claims. Bills come here year after year and year after year, some of them I know have been here 10 years and have been passed eight or nine times, and yet they will never be considered in the House. It is simply an expense brought on the Government unnecessarily.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the bill by striking out lines 7 and 8, and in line 9, the words "the city of Detroit, Mich.," as follows:

While standing in the safety zone waiting for a street car at the corner of Fort Street west and Artillery Avenue, in the city of Detroit, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I now move to strike out all in line 10, page 1, after the word "truck," and all on page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, in line 10, after the word "truck," strike out the following language: "which was running at a rapid rate of speed and without lights, it being 6 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m. and quite dark. Said Morgan Miller's head was badly injured, left shoulder and hip greatly bruised, right knee and ankle wrenched quite severely, and the ligaments badly torn. He was in the hospital about five days and was confined to his bed for three months, and as a result of the accident became almost totally incapacitated and has been since that time dependent upon relatives and friends for support," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Morgan Miller, the sum of $3,000 for injuries sustained on February 3, 1920, by being struck by a United States mail truck.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBMARINE "S–4"

The resolution (S. Res. 109) creating a committee of the Senate to investigate the sinking of the submarine S–4 was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

The bill (S. 1939) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I promised the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] that I would examine the report. I have nearly completed the examination and will have done so during the day; and if to-morrow, or the next calendar day, he will ask to have the bill taken up, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2900) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. The same applies to that bill, and I will ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

REGISTRATION OF ARCHITECTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 2660) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the examination and registration of architects and to regulate the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia," approved December 13, 1924, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator reporting the bill is not present, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SEPARATION OF RACES IN DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY CARS

The bill (S. 781) requiring separate accommodations for white and colored passengers on street cars in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill has been adversely reported and will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLEASE subsequently said: Mr. President, what was done with Calendar 171, the bill (S. 781) requiring separate accommodations for white and colored passengers on street cars in the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was indefinitely postponed under an adverse report by the committee.

Mr. BLEASE. I ask that that motion be reconsidered and the bill again placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed and that it remain on the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. BLEASE. No; I will not. I was perfectly willing to have the bill to go over, but I certainly object to having an adverse report adopted in my absence. I had stepped out of the Chamber for just a moment and the unfavorable report was adopted in my absence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator's bill has been reinstated on the calendar.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not so understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been placed back on the calendar. Calendar No. 171, the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina refers, retains its place on the calendar.

Mr. BLEASE. Very well. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLEASE subsequently said: I propose an amendment to Senate bill 781, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLEASE was read, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table, as follows:

Add, at the end of the bill, the words: "Provided, That in case where a white person desires to ride with a negro, and the negro does not object, that the white person, upon request, be allowed by the person in charge of the car to ride with the negro."

BILLS PASSED OVER

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, there are three bills on the calendar, Nos. 175, 176, and 184, which I am not ready to take up this morning. I ask that they may go over, but remain on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The titles of the bills will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill (S. 132) to authorize the President to appoint LeRoy K. Pemberton a first lieutenant, Officers' Reserve Corps, United States Army; the bill (S. 2053) to establish a military record for Daniel P. Tafe; and the bill (S. 141) for the relief of Felix Medler.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those numbers will go over at the request of the Senator from California. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 1736) for the relief of Charles Caudwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BLACK subsequently said: Mr. President, I would like to ask that we recur to Calendar No. 181 and that it be considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I still object to its consideration at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah maintains his objection.

The bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the National Surety Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is a very small amount, but there may be a principle involved. I should be very glad to understand the reason why, if a surety company bonded the postmaster and paid under the bond, it should be reimbursed. The reasons may be very persuasive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that neither the author of the bill nor the Senator who reported it from the Committee on Claims is present.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 7553) for the relief of James Neal was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1917

The bill (S. 2370) to amend section 24 of the immigration act of 1917 was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, certain objections were made to this bill when it was last reached on the call of the calendar. To correct those objections I desire to offer a few amendments and I ask Senators to withhold their objection to it until we do so. Of course, objection can be made at any time before the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, to strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five," so as to read:

Immigrant inspectors shall be divided into five grades.

Mr. KING. I have not yet consented to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Utah that objection may be interposed at any time, even after the bill has been perfected by amendment. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, strike out the words "grade 6, at such higher salaries as the Secretary of Labor may deem advisable."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if, in assigning the immigration inspectors and the other employees as provided in the bill to certain grades under the present law, we will be increasing their salaries.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It will result in an increase in the total.

Mr. SMOOT. To what extent?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is shown on the last page of the report, page 6, 834 inspectors, but in no case does the increase exceed $300 a year, and in most cases it is much less than that.

Mr. SMOOT. It increases the amount by $147,000.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the maximum. It would not attain that amount, but that is the maximum if every inspector were given the maximum promotion in the discretion of the department.

If the Senator will permit me to have the amendments made, I can then in a word explain the effect of the bill as amended, and I beg him to let me do that now, as he can object at any time later to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the Senator is making the explanation just suggested, I would be very glad if he would explain the reason why we should legislate as herein provided. We enacted a classification law a number of years ago which was supposed to incorporate within it all or substantially all of the civil-service employees of the Government. If we pass a classification act to deal with employees of the Government, it does seem to me it is unwise by a stepladder process to amend that law, because we can not tell what the result will be. We shall be called upon to make changes in that classification every time some person feels that he is a little better qualified than somebody else and that he should have an increase in his salary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator made that point very forcefully the last time the bill was called for consideration and I think I can answer it. But may we not have the amendments first agreed to?

Mr. KING. Let the pending amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 8 and 9, page 1, strike out the words "grade 6, at such higher salaries as the Secretary of Labor may deem advisable."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is not appointing any of them in grade 6?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There will be no grade 6. In line 5, by an amendment just agreed to a few moments ago, we have changed the word "six" to "five."

Mr. SMOOT. We are in hopes of having a survey of all employees of the Government in the field service outside of the District of Columbia. It does seem to me that this legislation is going to hamper a clean-cut report when that work is finally accomplished.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator withhold his suggestion just a moment and let us discuss it a moment later? If we get the amendments made the Senator will see that the proposition is much more moderate than as stated in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 10, strike out the word "grade" and insert in lieu thereof the words "grades 2 and," so it will read: "Inspectors shall be promoted successively to grades 2 and 3," and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 6, strike out the numeral "5" and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "3."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 11, after the word "another," insert the words "in a foreign country," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 24 of the immigration act of 1917 is hereby amended by adding the following at the end of the section: "Immigrant inspectors shall be divided into five grades, as follows: Grade 1, salary $2,100; grade 2, salary $2,300; grade 3, salary $2,500; grade 4, salary $2,700; grade 5, salary $3,000; and hereafter, inspectors shall be promoted successively to grades 2 and 3 at the beginning of the next quarter following one years's satisfactory service (determined by a standard of efficiency which is to be defined by the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor) in the next lower grade; not to exceed 50 per cent of the force to grades 4 and 5 for meritorious service after no less than one year's service in grades 3 and 4, respectively: Provided further, That promotion above grade 3 shall be at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration: Provided further, That when inspectors or other employees of the Immigration Service are ordered to perform duty in a foreign country, or transferred from one station to another in a foreign country, they shall be allowed their traveling expenses in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may deem advisable, and they may also be allowed, within the discretion and under written orders of the Secretary of Labor, the expenses incurred for the transfer of their wives and dependent minor children; their household effects and other personal property, not exceeding in all 5,000 pounds, including the expenses for packing, crating, freight, and drayage thereof: Provided further, That the appropriation of such sum as may be necessary for the enforcement of this act is hereby authorized."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senate will permit me, I should like in less than five minutes to make an explanation of this measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that is done, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment just stated, since I understand its significance, unless the Senator in his explanation will show that there is a limitation. To allow expenses without limitation and without restriction, it seems to me, would be unwise and quite improvident.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The provision follows the language providing allowance for expenses of transportation in the Army, which limits the number of pounds that may be transported. As the Senator will see, in line 18, page 2, the weight of household effects which may be transported is limited by that provision. It is difficult to put in a money limitation, because the transfer is sometimes expensive. The purpose of the last amendment was to make sure that traveling expenses should be allowed only in cases of transfer in foreign stations and not be allowed for travel within this country. That question had been raised and we wanted to make it plain.

Now, if Senators will look at pages 2 and 3 of the report they will see a picture which shows the whole necessity for this bill. These inspectors are really charged with duties calling for high skill and great discretion. In most cases they are required to speak more than one language. In the New York office some of them speak a half dozen or more languages.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. For information, I should like to ask whether these immigrant inspectors are appointed under the Federal civil service law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President, they are. Their duties correspond in exactingness with those of inspectors who are employed by the Post Office Department and the special agents of the Department of Justice. Upholding the immigration restriction laws of the United States depends on the fidelity of these men.

The examination of the incoming immigrants must be made with the utmost skill, intelligence, and tact. We call on these men not only for that kind of ability but we call on them to work long hours overtime. When ships come in on Sundays we call on them to work on Sunday, and there is no provision of which I know that gives them any allowance for such overtime.

Now, if Senators will look at pages 2 and 3 of the report they will see what these men get for that work. The average post-office inspector gets $3,700 per year; the average special agent of the Department of Justice gets $3,200 a year; the average internal-revenue inspector gets $2,966 a year; the average prohibition investigator gets $2,300 a year; the average examiner and special agent in the customs service gets $2,200 a year; but in the Immigration Service, which guards America against the greatest menace that confronts it—much worse than the cheating of the customs or the theft of mail or the evils against which the other inspectors protect us—the average inspector of immigrants in the Immigration Service gets only $2,130 a year. The senior patrol inspectors get $1,921 a year, the ordinary patrol inspectors get only $1,739 a year, but we call on those men for a much higher quality of service, in my opinion, than any of the other inspectors in the other departments are called upon to perform.

They are not in the classified service, to answer the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], because they are in the field service. I understand they can be put in the classified service by an order of the President, but that has not been done in this case, as I understand that it has not been done in the case of practically all other employees in the field service. If they were in the classified service, I agree with the Senator from Utah, it would be unwise to amend the law piecemeal, but as they are not in that service and as they are wholly dependent upon just such legislation as this for adequate pay, and as they never have had an adequate increase since the increase in the cost of living brought about by the World War, it seems to me that they deserve this increase more than does almost any other class of Government employees.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was about to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, with his permission, why could we not place these employees by legislation, if legislation is required, under the classified service or relegate them to the provisions of that act?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If we did that, as a practical matter, I understand that the men who would get an advantage out of it would be principally the seniors and the higher classes that are getting greater pay now than the men at the bottom; the ordinary immigration inspector would get no benefit at all out of that; and if we are going to do it for one, as in this case, we ought to do it for all; and it would have the effect of reducing the salaries to a very great extent if we did it for all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I observe, in the Senator's time, that the classification act, in my opinion, is too considerate of the "higher ups," if I may be permitted that expression. It looks as though they dictated the classification act, and they have gotten too much, but some of the subordinates, down at the foot of the ladder, oftentimes have not had sufficient.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is just the trouble here.

Mr. KING. But the Senator knows that this is bad legislation and its effect is going to be bad; it is going to encourage other governmental agencies and their personnel to appeal for the rectification of what they conceive to be disadvantages and disparities that exist in their cases.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would agree with that if the bill brought these men above any other class of inspectors, but it only brings them up to the lowest corresponding class in any other department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in my opinion this is not the way to reach the difficulty. The Senator will remember, I think, that either two or three years ago we provided in the appropriation bill for an increase in the compensation of these employees. I pleaded then for a greater appropriation to take care of these employees, they not being in the classified service. I would a hundred times prefer to provide for them in an appropriation bill and secure what we originally endeavored to secure than now to enact this character of legislation. It will have the effect of upsetting that whole program.

I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am perfectly willing to try again to increase the appropriation for these employees in the appropriation bill. It ought to be done; the discrepancy was only half corrected when we made the additional appropriation two years ago, as I recall, although it may have been three years ago. However, I am hopeful that it will not be very long until all of the employees outside of those in the District of Columbia shall be classified exactly as are all employees in the District, and when that is done even the group covered by the pending bill will fall under the classification act. I am quite sure that under that method of procedure they would receive higher salaries than they are drawing to-day.

I agree with every word the Senator from Pennsylvania has said as to the work these men are called upon to perform, as to the intelligence required of them, and the extreme hard work that is placed upon them, especially those in the lower grades. Anybody who will go to New York and visit the receiving room and see how they have to work there will realize that their duties are arduous. I want to say right now that there is no place in the United States where employees are called upon to labor harder than they are there. Not only that, but they are called upon to work overtime, day and night, whenever there is a call for their services. But I repeat this is not the way to legislate. If we pass this bill, it is going to return to plague us when we try to do the proper thing by all of the employees concerned.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator will see that this bill merely brings these employees up to the lowest corresponding pay of other inspectors.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 2 of the bill, beginning in line 5, I call the Senator's attention to the clause—

> That promotion above grade 3 shall be at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor—

And so forth.

If we shall enact legislation of that kind and the field service is classified, we will either have to repeal this measure, if it should become a law, or else there will be no harmony at all under the classification act.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator please, that is exactly what I would hope to do—to repeal this bill in the event it shall become a law as soon as there may be accomplished a general classification of the field service. I will not offer one word of objection when that time comes to a complete repeal of what we are doing here. The Senator is exactly right. The field service ought to be classified, but, as he knows, it is not classified now, and this is just to take care of this group of inspectors until such time as that wise classification shall be made. That is all I ask.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator be satisfied not to pass this bill or enact legislation on the subject at this time, but in the appropriation bill do what we did two years ago and increase the salaries of this group, in order that they may be taken care of in that way?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The trouble is that the appropriation bill has passed, as the Senator knows, and has gone to the President.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a number of other appropiration bills that are coming along.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We can not change the pay scales in the Labor Department, as a practical matter, by an amendment to any other appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish I had known that this measure was on the Calendar prior to the time when the bill making appropriations for the Department of Labor was passed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired, and the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is evident that this bill is going to require further consideration, and I think that it should go over. I therefore make that request.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the bill is about to pass and I hope the Senator will not ask that it go over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection. As one of those who objected to the consideration of this bill when it last came up, I should like to explain for the RECORD that my objection was to the language in line 8, which has now been amended by the Senate, because I felt that it was too broad and did not carry out the intention of the proposed act. I should like to say now that I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the necessity for the enactment of this proposed legislation, and I trust that my colleague will withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the junior Senator from Wisconsin succumb to the blandishments of his colleague?

Mr. BLAINE. I do; if it is understood that all of the calendar day is not going to be consumed in discussion of this bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS MOONEY

The bill (S. 134) for the relief of Francis Mooney was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, addressing myself to the Senator from Utah, I invite attention to the closing sentence of the report of the committee, and for the RECORD I read:

> Your committee feels, in view of the fact that this soldier enlisted in the United States forces three times subsequent to his recapture from the Confederates, receiving an honorable discharge each time, and that there is no definite record that he ever took an oath of allegiance to the Confederate government, that the relief requested should be granted.

But, Mr. President, Mr. Francis Mooney, brave soldier, willing to die for his country, is past all human aid; since the introduction of this bill he has sought, and I am sure will receive, his reward in heaven; in other words, he is dead. Wherefore I ask that the bill may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be entered.

GOVERNORS OF PROVINCES IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the Governor General without the consent of the Philippine Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, there is another bill which the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions has under consideration relating to this same general theme. It is proper that this bill should go over until that bill can be considered. For that reason I ask to have it passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that when he anticipates calling up either of these bills I hope he will do me the courtesy to advise me, because I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. My own thought is that the bills are of enough importance to ask for a special time for their consideration. I think it not practical to consider either of them in a session of this kind.

Mr. KING. I want to say to the Senator that I intend to offer as a substitute for these bills, or one of them, a bill which grants the Filipinos independence.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, I hope that substitute will be defeated; but it is of enough importance to warrant full discussion, and we will seek to have a day fixed for it.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This joint resolution, being the unfinished business, will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 3145) for the relief of Willis B. Cross was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 3315) for the relief of Charles A. Black, alias Angus Black, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

NONSECTARIAN CHAPEL AT ARMY MEDICAL CENTER

The bill (H. R. 6991) authorizing the erection of a nonsectarian chapel at the Army medical center in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that project will not cost the United States a cent. It is for the donation of a chapel to Walter Reed Hospital.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT ASHLAND, KY.

The bill (S. 2731) granting the consent of Congress to the Rogers Bros. Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at Ashland, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the substitution for this bill of House bill 5722, which has already passed the House, on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the House bill been reported from the committee of the Senate?

Mr. SACKETT. No; but it is the same bill as the bill which is on the calendar. The House amended it slightly, in accordance with the form of the House. It is a bridge bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the House bill on the calendar?

Mr. SACKETT. No; the House bill is not on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator the bill there, and does he offer it as an amendment to this bill or as a substitute?

Mr. SACKETT. I have the bill here. I desire to substitute it for this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state, for the information of the senior Senator from Utah, that this bill is in the hands of the Committee on Commerce. Are the bills identical?

Mr. SACKETT. They are not quite identical, because the House bill was amended slightly in the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senate bill was reported with amendments. Do the amendments make them identical?

Mr. SACKETT. Not quite.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the House bill in regular form?

Mr. SACKETT. The House bill is in regular form, and was reported by the House committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the House bill will be substituted for the Senate bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5722) authorizing the Rogers Bros. Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Ashland, Ky.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 2731 will be indefinitely postponed.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

The bill (S. 2450) to amend the immigration act of 1924, entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is the bill upon which the Members of the Senate have been hearing so much from the professors of all the colleges through the country.

The present immigration law does not permit a professor to come in unless he has been actively engaged in teaching for two years immediately preceding his entrance. The colleges find that that bars them from getting men who have been doing special research work, and professors who have left off their teaching in order to take further teaching courses, equipping themselves better for progress; and it also bars the admission of the scientists who are desired by the technical schools. They made a request for the general admission of all such scientists; but it seemed to the committee wise that we should not give them promiscuous permission to come and stay. That is the reason why we have added amendments which, in substance, will require these teachers to leave the United States when they cease to teach here, so as to prevent their coming in and using their profession merely as an excuse for permanent immigration here, without intending to continue in their profession.

With the amendments that we have offered, the bill will not make any substantial change in the effect of the law, and will be of great service to all of the universities and colleges of the country.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit an interrogatory. I was not able to be present the day the committee considered this bill. Just what is the provision of the amendment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment strikes out the words "or professor of a college, academy, seminary, or university" from that part of the bill which deals with ministers of religion. It puts the professors in a separate class, as the Senator will by page 2 of the amended bill, and limits that very definitely to those who are professional instructors who come here under a contract to teach for a definite term with a university or college which is approved by the Secretary of Labor—we do not want any imitation colleges importing people—and provides that the institution must make continuous reports to the Secretary of Labor of the employment and the termination of employment of the professor, and that if they fail to make that report their mere failure to report will cause the withdrawal of the approval under which the alien is here.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator feels, then, that the general principle of the restrictive immigration law is sufficiently preserved and guarded as amended?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think it is even strengthened, because it requires these continuous reports to be made so that the Secretary of Labor can keep check on these people; and when the approval is withdrawn and the employment terminated they must leave the country.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator's statement on that point, because, frankly, I have not been very greatly impressed with the necessity for the legislation unless it is carefully restricted as the Senator indicates. I have wondered, sometimes, whether we did not have too many foreign professors in our colleges and universities anyhow. I wondered whether our college students are not going out with too much of the international viewpoint of things and too little of the American viewpoint. Personally, I wish we had more American professors and fewer foreign professors, but with the Senator's statement as to the care with which this bill has been guarded I shall not offer objections and shall support the measure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, as I understand, when the report is not made promptly the approval theretofore granted is automatically withdrawn?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then what does the bill provide in respect of that particular professor, his wife, and unmarried children?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, he would be in this country illegally. He would be expected to take his departure from it, and if he did not take it it would be taken for him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And that applies to all that are covered by the language of the bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is my understanding; and the further effect would be that the approval for that institution would be withdrawn, and they could not bring in any other professors in the future.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For further clearing up of the law, perhaps, the man comes in as a professor; he may bring his wife and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, "if accompanying or following to join him."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the present law, also.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely; and in the event that he ceases to be entitled to remain he must go, as well as all who have come with him covered by the law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Even though the unmarried children shall have married? Must they still go?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, if children are born here, they are citizens.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They are American citizens.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And they are not required to depart.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am not absolutely certain as to the status of those people, and I should have to look it up. My impression is that they would have to go.

I have an amendment to offer, Mr. President, to the last committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment reported by the committee has not yet been agreed to. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "university," to insert "approved by the Secretary of Labor," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the immigration act of 1924 entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"SECTION 1. Subdivision (d) of section 4 is amended by striking out the words 'or professor of a college, academy, seminary, or university.'"

SEC. 2. There is hereby added to section 4 a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(f) An immigrant who is qualified to teach as may be by regulations defined, who seeks to enter the United States solely for the purpose of teaching in, and who shall have a written contract to teach for a definite term with, a college, academy, seminary, or university approved by the Secretary of Labor; and his wife, and his unmarried children under 18 years of age, if accompanying or following to join him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 10, after the word "him," to insert:

Provided, That such institution of learning shall have agreed to report to the Secretary of Labor the termination of the employment of such teacher, and if any such institution of learning fails to make such reports promptly the approval shall be withdrawn.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that language is an exact copy of the language appearing in a subsequent section of the bill with regard to the entry of foreign students; but I think we can make it even stronger by requiring them to report also the continuance of the employment as well as its termination. Therefore I suggest the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment proposed, on page 2, line 11, after the word "the" and before the word "termination," it is proposed to insert "continuation and," so that if amended it will read:

Provided, That such institution of learning shall have agreed to report to the Secretary of Labor the continuation and termination of the employment—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one word in connection with the observations made by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. I know that he is a man of broad sympathies, and I am sure that nothing he said was intended to indicate that he believed that art and science and truth and the great geniuses who have manifested themselves in literary productions are to be confined to national lines. Art rises above boundaries and climes, and we are glad to welcome to the United States the great truths—scientific, political, and otherwise—that come from beyond the seas.

I have been glad to see some of the great scientists and great teachers and instructors from other countries come to our universities, and I am glad to see the reciprocity which exists. Many American teachers have gone to the universities and colleges and schools of the Old World, as well as some from Latin-American states. I think that those interchanges are auguries of better internationalism and a better spirit, producing amity and good will and peace throughout the world.

One of my young friends has received a scholarship and is now in Seville, Spain, learning the Spanish language, learning the art and literature of that country, which once almost dominated the world. Many of our fine young men are being educated in Oxford; they go to Heidelberg; they go to the great universities of the world and receive benefits, as students who come from other countries of the world to our universities are benefited. Moreover, Mr. President, by this interchange of views and by associations the narrow, bitter spirit which has actuated so many people, provocative of international strife, will be broken down, and a broader spirit of world unity and fellowship will unite the world together.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I find myself in full accord with the views expressed by both the Senators. It is a very interesting fact in my experience that many persons in my State who have advocated absolute restriction of immigration have indicated to me their desire to have this particular measure enacted into law. I hope there may be no hesitation on the part of the Senate and that it will be favorably acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation. I did not desire to delay action upon this bill, which I have supported, nor do I desire that my position shall be misunderstood. I quite agree with the observation made by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that there are certain lines of culture and information that range far beyond national limitations; and yet I feel strongly inclined to maintain my thesis, namely, that it is of the greatest importance that the graduates from our colleges and universities shall have the American viewpoint of things; and, for one, I feel that it would be as well if there were a larger degree of Americanism and a smaller degree of internationalism in the teachings had in our colleges and universities.

MARTHA HENSON

The bill (S. 1637) for the relief of Martha Henson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. BAYARD. Will not the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to the passage of this bill, giving $5,000 to Martha Henson, when I find in the report from Secretary Davis this language:

> The party injured, therefore, has no legal claim against the United States.

We have just passed a bill appropriating $3,000 for an injury to a lady, and now here is one for $5,000 for a person who has no claim against the United States. I object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield for just a moment? The claimant in this case is a woman who was struck by a Government truck. The investigation has clearly proven—and it is not contradicted—that the truck had no brakes on it, was operating in the middle of Baltimore city going down a hill, ran into a street car, and injured this claimant.

Mr. SMOOT. That is claimed. I have read the report, and on the report, I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah makes objection, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. TYDINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that we recur to Calendar No. 244, Senate bill 1637, for the relief of Martha Henson. I would like to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recurring to Senate bill 1637?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, providing the Senate now will agree, before we take up the bill, that the $5,000 will be cut to $2,500.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I offer an amendment to strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500," so as to make the bill read:

> That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Martha Henson, of Baltimore City, Md., out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 as compensation for injuries received by her on November 25, 1918, when a street car of the United Railways & Electric Co., of Baltimore, Md., on which the said Martha Henson was a passenger, was struck at or near the corner of Patterson Park Avenue and Fleet Street, Baltimore, Md., by a motor vehicle belonging to and owned by the United States and operated by a soldier of the United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS IN HAWAII

The bill (S. 757) to extend the benefits of certain acts of Congress to the Territory of Hawaii was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Territory of Hawaii has not shared equally with the States, save in one case, in the benefits conferred by the several acts passed by Congress for the advancement of agriculture in the States and Territories, notwithstanding the apparent intent that all organized Territories should participate with the States on an equal basis.

Hawaii's needs in this respect are set forth in a statement by Dr. D. L. Crawford, president of the University of Hawaii, which was before the committee, and from which the following facts are deduced.

Of the several acts passed by Congress for the advancement of agriculture in the States and Territories, Hawaii shares directly in only one. The second Morrill Act and the Nelson amendment provided $50,000 per year for the support of agricultural colleges, "appropriated to the States and Territories." In 1907 Hawaii's right to participate in this appropriation was officially recognized on the basis of its political status as a Territory, and from that time Hawaii has received the annual grant for its university as do the States for their land-grant colleges.

The Hatch Act and the Adams Act were intended to supplement and augment the work of the land-grant colleges by providing Federal funds for maintaining agricultural experiment stations "under the direction of the college of agriculture in each State or Territory" established under the Morrill Act.

The Adams Act made additional appropriations for the same object, "to each State and Territory for the more complete endowment and maintenance of agricultural experiment stations now established or which may hereafter be established in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 2, 1887" (the Hatch Act).

Throughout these two acts the reference is to State and Territories and would seem to indicate that these benefits are to be applied in the same manner as the Morrill Act in connection with the college of agriculture in each State and Territory. Inasmuch as Congress has for many years included the Territory of Hawaii within the scope of the second Morrill Act and the Nelson amendment, it seems reasonable that the same interpretation should be made of the Hatch and Adams Acts in relation to Hawaii. This, however, has not been done.

It seems to me it is an act of justice for the Territory of Hawaii to put them on the same basis with the States and other Territories as to these other acts.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I would not feel that I was doing my duty if I did not call attention to some facts which have developed. This bill was rather fully considered by our committee, with a goodly attendance of the committee, and we were of the opinion that the objects sought were proper and we voted to report the bill.

Soon after the bill was introduced I had sent a copy of it to the department for report, as is the practice of the chairman of the committee, and the department was rather dilatory in replying; so we went ahead and acted on the bill without receiving the report.

Subsequent to the action of the committee and the filing of the report, I received a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture approving the general principle but not approving this bill. I do not think I would be doing my duty as chairman of the committee if I did not have this letter of the secretary, with the accompanying suggestions, printed in the RECORD. I am perfectly willing to let the bill pass and be amended in the House.

Mr. BRUCE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the objection of the Senator from Maryland the bill be passed over. Without objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from Ohio will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
> Washington, February 11, 1928.
> Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
> Chairman Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions,
> United States Senate.
> DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of January 11, 1928, transmitting a copy of S. 757 and requesting this department's views concerning the advisability of this legislation, has been received.
> This bill proposes to extend to the Territory of Hawaii the benefits of the act of March 2, 1887, commonly known as the Hatch Act, and supplementary acts, Adams Act and Purnell Act, providing for the establishment and maintenance of agricultural experiment stations, and the act of May 8, 1914, the Smith-Lever Act, which provides for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges receiving the benefits of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, the Morrill Act, and acts supplementary thereto.
> The department has given special consideration to this proposed legislation, as it would change the policy hitherto pursued in providing for agricultural investigations in the outlying Territories and would establish a precedent which might subsequently lead to similar movement on the part of other Territories and possessions having colleges of agriculture. Hence the form of the proposed legislation is believed important, in order that, if enacted, it might serve as a basis for action in other similar cases.
> You probably know that Congress has made special provision from time to time for the establishment of experiment stations in the outlying Territories and possessions. In no case has this been based on the experiment station acts applicable to the States, but it has taken the form of special legislation authorizing appropriations for the conduct of experiment stations under the immediate direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. This procedure is considered to have been particularly adapted to the pioneer stages of experiment-station work in the Territories. It has given a continuity to the work and the carrying out of a fixed policy, which otherwise might not always have prevailed, and it has enabled the department to address itself to what seemed the more important outstanding needs of the respective localities.
> With the coming of agricultural colleges in these Territories, the experiment station work has assumed increasing importance as a basis for sound teaching and as a point of contact with the farming public. The association of experiment station work with the colleges of agriculture has proved highly advantageous in the States, and as rapidly as the colleges in the outlying Territories develop sufficient strength and facilities it is believed that provision for such work in close cooperation and association with them is very desirable. I therefore favor such a measure as will afford the funds for organized agricultural investigation and place the colleges in position to develop in that line.

The maintenance of an experiment station in Hawaii for over 20 years has given a background and impetus to agricultural investigation which did not exist in the States at the time of the passage of the Hatch Act, and which it is felt should be taken advantage of. The Federal station in Hawaii has developed a plant and facilities, including land, which are now valued in the neighborhood of $5,000,000. The station has valuable collections of plant materials, a library, laboratories, office buildings, and other facilities which would be a very important asset to a new institution, and it has under way numerous lines of uncompleted investigation which it would not seem wise to relinquish or turn over to another agency. Furthermore, the Federal station is serving a very useful mission as a tropical station for the Pacific, for the introduction of plant materials, and the testing and developing of them for special regions. It is essential, therefore, that provision be made for continuing the existing Federal station and retaining possession of its valuable property and equipment; but through cooperation these facilities and its experienced working force could be made available to the college in conducting research; and the two agencies could be merged so as to furnish an effective working unit in carrying on investigation for Hawaiian agriculture, while leaving the existing agency free to continue, in addition, the special service of broader application to tropical agriculture in the Pacific.

The department's views of the form which this legislation might take in extending the benefits of the experiment station acts to the Territory of Hawaii are embodied in the inclosed tentative draft of a bill.

In explanation of this it may be pointed out that Federal aid for the establishment and maintenance of experiment stations in the States came gradually, in recognition of the fact that an effective station must be a matter of studious development. The wisdom of this provision has been abundantly attested, and it is believed to apply with no less force in the outlying territories, where a considerable period of preparation is inevitable. In view of this it is felt that an initial appropriation of $15,000, such as is provided under the Hatch Act of March 2, 1887, would be an appropriate beginning. Under the plan suggested, this would be followed the second year by the increase of $5,000 granted by the Adams Act of March 16, 1906, to increase by $2,000 a year until it matured at $15,000. This amount would then be followed by the increases, year by year, provided under the Purnell Act of February 24, 1925. Such a gradual increase would give opportunity for normal growth and for working out the cooperative relationships with the Department of Agriculture. While some 12 years would thus be required for the realization of the full amount, this increase is far more rapid than occurred in the States, where over 40 years from the initial appropriation will be necessary to reach the full appropriation authorized under existing legislation.

The expense of extending to the Territory of Hawaii the benefits of the experiment station acts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, as proposed by S. 757, would be $80,000, and the estimated expense of extending the benefits of the act of May 8, 1914, for agricultural extension work would be about $27,000, or a total of $107,000. The estimates for the Hawaii station, maintained by this department, for 1929 are $54,940, of which sum $10,000 is for agricultural extension work. Under the substitute plan, as proposed, the initial cost of applying these experiment station and extension acts would be $32,000 over the present appropriations. This would increase with the annual increment under the experiment station acts and with any subsequent legislation.

Sincerely yours,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

Submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, pursuant to Circular 49 of the Bureau of the Budget, and returned to the Department of Agriculture under date of February 3, 1928, with the advice that the legislation proposed in S. 757 would be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Mr. BINGHAM subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Maryland is willing to withdraw his objection to the consideration of Senate bill 757.

Mr. BRUCE. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recurring to the consideration of Senate bill 757?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like to have the Senator from Connecticut reconcile his views as to passing this bill with the opposition of the Secretary, as evidenced by the letter, which we have not had an opportunity to read, presented by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah desire to have the letter read?

Mr. KING. I will be satisfied to have an explanation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the letter, which was received after the committee acted, was accompanied by a complete redrafting of the bill. This redraft, which the Department of Agriculture prepared, has been introduced in the House by the Delegate from Hawaii as a substitute bill. My suggestion was that the Senate pass the bill as recommended by the committee; it will then go to the House; they will consider the redraft prepared by the Department of Agriculture, will probably amend the bill in accordance with the suggestions of the department, and then we can accept the amendments as agreed to by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not offer the amendment now?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should be very glad to offer it now.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be very much better than to have the bill pass the Senate with the understanding that it is to be amended in the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the Senate having recurred to the consideration of Senate bill 757, the Senator from Connecticut offers a certain amendment, which will be reported.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the bill prepared by the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be reported for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Does that meet the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. BINGHAM. This was drawn by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. I have just had inserted in the RECORD a certain letter, with which the Senator is familiar. Is this bill identical with that bill which accompanied that letter?

Mr. BINGHAM. They are identical.

Mr. WILLIS. And the Senator is now proposing——

Mr. BINGHAM. To substitute the suggestion of the Department of Agriculture for the pending bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I think that is wise.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the substitute be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the Territory of Hawaii shall be entitled to share in the benefits of the act entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," approved March 2, 1887, as amended and supplemented, and of the act entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," approved May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That the experiment station so established shall be conducted jointly and in collaboration with the existing Federal experiment station in Hawaii in enlarging and expanding the work of the said Federal station on cooperative plans approved by the Secretary of Agriculture; and the Secretary of Agriculture shall coordinate the work of the Territorial station with that of the Federal station and of the United States Department of Agriculture in the islands: Provided further, That the Territory of Hawaii shall make provision for such additional buildings and permanent equipment as may be necessary for the development of the work.

SEC. 2. To carry into effect the above provisions for extending to Hawaii the benefits of the act of March 2, 1887, and supplementary acts in the order and amounts designated by these acts, the following sums are hereby authorized to be appropriated in addition to the amounts appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for use in Hawaii: $15,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929; $20,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930; $22,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931; $24,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932; $26,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933; $28,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934; $30,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935; $50,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936; $60,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937; $70,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; $80,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939; and $90,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and thereafter a sum equal to that provided for each State and Territory for agricultural experiment stations established under the act of March 2, 1887.

SEC. 3. The permanent annual appropriations provided for in section 3 of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto are hereby authorized to be increased by an amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act but without diminishing or increasing the amount which any State is entitled to under the provisions of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the bill. There are some amendments needed. This appropriation for an indefinite period I do not approve of. Moreover, we have before us the Capper-Ketcham bill, which I think will cover some of the provisions in this measure. I think we ought to consider the two together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah object to the substitute?

Mr. KING. I do not object to the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as amended will go over, under objection.

WALTER W. JOHNSTON

The bill (S. 2711) for the relief of Walter W. Johnston was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Neither the author of the bill nor the Senator reporting the bill is present in the Chamber

Mr. KING. Let it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

ESTATES OF JOHN FRAZER AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 2855) for the relief of the estates of John Frazer, deceased; Zephaniah Kingsley, deceased; John Bunch, deceased; Jehu Underwood, deceased; and Stephen Vansandt, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS

The bill (S. 2781) to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia so as to empower the corporation counsel for the District of Columbia and his assistants to administer oaths was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same hereby is, amended, so as to add a new section thereto, to be known as section 932 (a), and to read as follows:

"SEC. 932. (a) The corporation counsel for the District of Columbia and his assistants are empowered to administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses in criminal cases and in any and all matters and things connected with the performance of their official duties; and if any person to whom such oath or affirmation shall be administered shall willfully and falsely swear or affirm touching any matter or thing material to the point in question whereto he shall be examined, he shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment at hard labor for the first offense for not less than 2 years nor more than 10 years, and for the second offense for not less than 5 years nor more than 15 years."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF

The resolution (S. Res. 135) to print the report of the twenty-fifth meeting of the convention of American Instructors of the Deaf as a Senate document was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the twenty-fifth meeting of the convention of American Instructors of the Deaf be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

NATIONAL SURETY CO.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 185, Senate bill 2335, for the relief of the National Surety Co. I have satisfied the Senator from Utah, and he has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. It is a bill to reimburse the National Surety Co. for a loss incurred by a postmaster. The bond was dated six months after the loss, so, of course, the surety company paid the money by mistake, and Mr. McCarl has recommended that the money be returned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recurring to the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object to returning to the bill, but I shall vote against it. The surety company made the payment, they were unwise enough to make the payment, and they ought to bear the loss.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$157.98" and to insert in lieu thereof "$157.89," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $157.89 to the National Surety Co., which sum represents a payment by the National Surety Co. of that sum to cover a shortage arising in the accounts of H. C. Lewis, late postmaster at Creech, Ky., which shortage occurred prior to the effective date of the bond written by the said surety company covering the above-named H. C. Lewis, and was not due or owed by the National Surety Co.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to make just a short statement in regard to this bill. I notice that this is the case of the surety company asking for the payment of a claim arising from a shortage in the funds of a postmaster.

There is now pending before the Committee on Claims a measure of this kind, where an individual registered a letter to New York containing $2,000 of bonds. He was just a private citizen; he was not a surety company. When that letter and those bonds got to New York City they were stolen.

Mr. KING. From the post office.

Mr. McKELLAR. From the post office. Thereupon an effort was made to sue the postmaster on his bond to recover the amount of the loss, for which he was clearly liable. The department declined to sue, and thereupon a bill was introduced here for the relief of the man who registered the letter. The bill has passed the House two or three times, has come to the Senate, and the Senate Committee on Claims has refused, up to this time, to report it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be through in just a moment. I merely want to say that I do not think the Senate ought to lay down one rule for surety companies and restore funds embezzled or stolen where the surety company has to pay the loss, and lay down another rule for the private citizen who loses money.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In this case the loss occurred before the surety company had written its policy and by misapprehension.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think where a Government agent steals money or other things of value from the mails the Government, as a bailee for hire, ought to make it good, and uniformly it is done. I think the only case I know of where it was not done is the case to which I have referred, which arose in the case of private citizens of Tennessee.

I wanted to make the statement at this time to show that it is perfectly proper, apparently, to pass bills here for the relief of surety companies; but when a private citizen loses through the mails, relief is denied him.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I can not let the statement of the Senator from Tennessee pass without some challenge. I happen to have been a member of the subcommittee which reported adversely the bill to which he referred. I want to say that in that particular case the adverse report was made upon the ground that the securities in question were put in a registered letter, a registry fee was paid, and, the registry fee having been paid, a contract arose between the sender and the Government that in the event of loss, the loss would be limited to $50. That amount of loss was paid, and on that ground the committee, for several sessions of Congress, made an adverse report on a bill providing for paying anything more on the claim in question.

THE CALENDAR—ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY TO MONDAY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of morning business to-morrow the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar beginning with the calendar number where we left off to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. That will apply only until 2 o'clock?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. CURTIS. I now ask further unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-morrow it shall adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

CONSTRUCTION OF RURAL POST ROADS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to offer and have printed an amendment to Senate bill 2327, authorizing appropriations for the construction of rural post roads during the two years following the present current year. My amendment proposes that 25 per cent of the money thus authorized to be expended shall be expended on rural mail routes not intercounty or interstate roads. The only authority under the Constitution for making appropriations for roads is to build and maintain post roads. The real post roads of the country to-day are the rural mail routes that reach out into the farming districts of every State. I think the road program has gone far enough in America, I think the automobile highways have been developed sufficiently that a part of this money should hereafter be expended for rural route roads which are used by the people out in the back-country districts. I shall discuss the amendment more fully when the good roads bill comes before the Senate for consideration.

I ask that my amendment may lie on the table until the bill to which I have referred comes up for action by the Senate. The amendment proposed and to be offered by me reads as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after "amended," insert a comma and the following: "except that at least 25 per cent of the sum apportioned to any State, to be deducted from the amount heretofore authorized to be expended upon interstate highways, shall be expended in the construction and reconstruction of rural post roads not interstate or intercounty in character, and the Federal-aid highway system of such State shall be extended to include such roads, as selected and designated by the State highway department, in addition to the mileage heretofore authorized."

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. DILL to the bill (S. 2327) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONDITIONS IN HAITI

Mr. KING. Mr. President, now that the Habana conference has terminated, I desire to offer a resolution which I had prepared some time ago, but which I have amended to bring down to date and which I now desire to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent to present a resolution which he desires to read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. KING. The resolution (S. Res. 158) which I submit reads as follows:

Senate Resolution 158, Seventieth Congress, first session

Whereas it is claimed that the following statement contains some of the important facts relating to the occupation of Haiti by the military forces of the United States, and also some of the important occurrences following such occupation, together with facts relating to the present conditions in Haiti:

More than a century ago the Haitian people achieved their independence and established a republican form of Government, under which they controlled their political affairs without interference from foreign powers until the United States seized and occupied their country in July, 1915, accomplishing the same by employing war vessels of the Government, which entered the ports and harbors of Haiti and landed large military forces upon Haitian shores;

That said military forces of the United States seized the public buildings in Haiti and important military positions; that the Haitian people were opposed to the invasion of their country by the armed forces of the United States, and some of them attempted to repel such invasion, as a result of which more than 2,500 Haitians were killed in conflicts with the armed forces of the United States;

There was no sufficient reason for sending war vessels to seize Haitian ports or to land American troops upon Haitian soil, whatever disturbances there were in said country being purely of an internal character and in no wise affecting the liberty of Americans or foreigners;

That after the seizure of Haiti the admiral in charge of the American forces declared martial law, took control of the Government of Haiti, interfered with the election, and exerted military pressure and all influences at his command to secure the election of Dartiguenave as President of Haiti.

The United States then presented to said Dartiguenave and to the National Assembly of Haiti, which consisted of two legislative bodies—the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate—a proposed convention, giving the United States control of the revenues, police, public works, and sanitary administration of Haiti, which the assembly was unwilling to ratify; whereupon the admiral in command of said American forces cut off the salaries of the opposing members of the assembly and announced that if the tendered treaty was not ratified the United States "has the intention to retain control in Haiti until the desired end is accomplished, and that it will forthwith proceed with the complete pacification of Haiti," under pressure of which threat the National Assembly accepted such convention in September, 1915.

That in 1916 a new National Assembly of Haiti was elected, pursuant to the Haitian constitution, and upon the convening of the same there was submitted to it by the United States a new constitution, prepared in the Navy Department of the United States, which, it was declared, was to supersede the constitution under which Haiti had been governed for many years. This new constitution materially changed the constitution of Haiti, among the changes being one which authorized foreigners and foreign corporations to hold Haitian lands, contrary to the Haitian constitution, which sought to protect the Haitian people from foreign domination and to preserve Haitian territory for the Haitian people.

This new constitution was not acceptable to the National Assembly of Haiti, whereupon the military forces of the United States summarily and forcibly dissolved the assembly, took possession of the legislative chambers, and locked the same against members of the assembly; and when the two branches of the assembly met in other places they were summarily and forcibly dispersed by American forces.

That thereupon an election was ordered by those representing the United States, for the alleged purpose of having said new constitution submitted to the people for ratification; that it was known that the people of Haiti opposed the so-called new constitution, but a few votes were cast under the supervision and control of military forces and under conditions that indicated pressure and intimidation of the Haitian people, as a result of which it is claimed that no election or true expresson of the people was had and that said new constitution was not in fact ratified by the people of Haiti.

Upon the dissolution of said national assembly, said Dartiguenave, by dictatorial decree, set up a so-called council of state (appointing all the members thereof), which was an extraconstitutional and illegal body and which pretended to take over and exercise the legislative powers of the national assembly; and it has continued from that time until the present to exercise said usurpatory authority in defiance of the will of the Haitian people. In its acts and proceedings it is claimed said council of state has been merely the instrument to register the will of the President of Haiti who has been and is controlled by the United States.

The term of office of said Dartiguenave expired August 12, 1922, and thereupon, as is claimed, the United States selected Louis Borno to be his successor; that said council of state had no power or authority to act in the premises, but the members of said illegal organization, with the support of the American military occupation, pretended to elect as President of Haiti said Louis Borno, although he was not eligible to the Presidency of the Haitian Republic because he is not the son of a Haitian citizen, as prescribed by the constitution of Haiti;

That under the constitution of Haiti, as well as the void and unratified new constitution, the two legislative bodies of the Haitian Government were empowered to meet as a national assembly and to elect, at the times designated in said constitutions, respectively, the President of the Haitian Republic;

That said council of state, in the matter stated, and in defiance of said provisions, pretended to elect said Borno for the term of four years, the period prescribed in the so-called new constitution, which the National Assembly of Haiti had refused to accept;

That the constitution of Haiti, as well as the new constitution, sought to be imposed on the Haitians, provides for the election of the members of the two legislative bodies of the Haitian Republic, but since the suppression of said bodies no elections, except as hereinafter stated, have been held, or permitted to be held, by those in control of Haiti, as a result of which no national assembly existed to choose the President of Haiti, as provided in said constitutions;

That under the terms of the new constitution a President of Haiti was to have been chosen by the national assembly on the 12th day of April, 1926, but said assembly having been abolished by the military forces of the United States and the dictatorial decree of Dartiguenave, said council of State, with the approval and support of the military forces of the United States, pretended, on said day, to reelect said Borno as President for a further term of four years; that it was understood for many months prior to said date that Borno aspired to another term as President and was supported for such position by General Russell, who commanded the military forces of the United States in Haiti and who also bears the title of the American high commissioner, if not the Department of State of the United States. To bring about that result said Borno shortly prior to April, 1926, appointed 18 of the 21 members of the council of state from among his relatives, personal friends, and retainers in order that he might be assured of his reelection on April 12 of this year;

That the term of said convention of September, 1915, expired on September 15, 1926; that if the United States had any right under convention to occupy Haiti and control its Government and the people of Haiti, such right no longer exists and the further presence of the United States in Haiti means the continued unauthorized control of Haiti and her people by superior military forces;

That said new constitution contained substantially the same provision as the Haitian constitution with respect to freedom of speech and the press and the guaranties of personal liberty, and also with respect to the judiciary and the powers and functions of judicial officers;

That those in control of Haiti have been dissatisfied with the independence of members of the judiciary and their interpretations of the constitution and the laws and the protection which they have accorded to the personal and property rights of the Haitian people. This situation resulted in the demand, upon the part of those controlling the political and governmental affairs of Haiti, for a suppression or repeal of said constitutional provisions, and notwithstanding said officials had declared that the people of Haiti were unfit to vote, an election was called for the 12th of January, 1928, to repeal said provision of the constitution;

That the proposed amendments to the constitution are for the purpose of legalizing the denial of freedom of the press and personal liberties, including the right to trial by jury, and for the purpose of placing the judiciary under the control of those dominating Haiti;

That it is claimed that the de facto Government of Haiti is the United States acting through General Russell, who is supported by the military forces of the United States, and that Borno and said council of state act in accordance with the directions given to them, that the liberties of the people are restricted, the freedom of the press destroyed, the independence of the courts interfered with, the voice of the people in the matter of levying taxes and expending them silenced, the right of franchise denied, and the people of Haiti subjected to a foreign control which attempts to screen its power behind Haitian agencies which have been set up and through which it operates;

That there will be no correction of these conditions and no restoration of civil government and constitutional authority in Haiti until the chamber of deputies and the senate shall be elected by the people of Haiti, and shall, in turn, as an electoral body, elect the President of Haiti under the terms of the Haitian constitution;

That the suppression of civil authority by military power is contrary to the Constitution of the United States and those principles of political and civil liberty which are professed by the Government and the people of the United States: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is directed to consider the statements and claims herein set forth, and to make such investigations as are necessary to ascertain the reason for the seizure and continued occupation of Haiti by the United States, the reasons why the constitution of Haiti was superseded, the election suppressed, the rights of the Haitian people interfered with, the guaranties of liberty, freedom of speech and of the press under said constitution impaired; and also to inquire into the present conditions in Haiti and report their findings to the Senate, together with such measures as shall permit the Haitian people to set up and establish a government of their own choice and assume control of the same and their own civil and political affairs, and which shall provide for the withdrawal from Haiti of all military forces of the United States and all officers—military, naval, and otherwise—except only regularly accredited diplomatic representatives or consular agents as may be agreed upon by the Government of the United States and the Government of the Haitian Republic.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may lie upon the table. I shall seek an opportunity at an early date to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) providing for the completion of Dam No. 2 and the steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2, in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before I begin to address the Senate, I should like to have a correction made in the joint resolution of what I believe is a misprint. I desire to amend the resolution, on page 5, line 7, by striking out "Dam No. 1" and inserting in lieu thereof "nitrate plant No. 1."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is engaged with the coal-investigation committee in Pittsburgh and is to be absent for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are absent from the Chamber engaged on public business in the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is absent on business of the Senate in attendance upon the committee investigating the coal industry in Pittsburgh.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the joint resolution which is now before the Senate will, if passed, dispose at least for 10 years of Muscle Shoals. This joint resolution comes before the Senate with almost a unanimous report of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is very similar to a joint resolution which that committee reported at the last session of Congress. The only changes that have been made in it have been made at the request of the Department of Agriculture.

The joint resolution provides, in brief, that the Secretary of War shall complete Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals by installing the machinery originally contemplated, being a part of the plans and specifications of that dam. The places for the machines are already there; all provision is made for them in every way, excepting the purchase and installation of the generators that are necessary according to the original plans and specifications of that great dam.

The joint resolution also provides that the Secretary of War shall complete the steam plant located at nitrate plant No. 2 in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals by installing there the machinery, boiler, and engine capacity originally contemplated, being a part of the original plans and specifications of that great steam plant. The foundations, the building, and everything are there, ready to make this installation.

The joint resolution then provides that the Secretary of War shall sell the electricity developed at the dam and at the steam plant to persons, partnerships, States, counties, and corporations, giving preference in such sale to counties, municipalities, and such public organizations not existing for profit.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator; yes.

Mr. COPELAND. When the Senator speaks of selling to a municipality, does he mean to a municipality as such?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COPELAND. For the use of the city itself?

Mr. NORRIS. For the use of the municipality.

Mr. COPELAND. But not for the municipality to sell in turn?

Mr. NORRIS. The municipality, of course, would sell to its people.

Mr. COPELAND. For power purposes?

Mr. NORRIS. If there were power concerns in the municipality or in that vicinity, they could sell to them.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. KING. Would the Government be subjected to the same rules and regulations that may be prescribed in the various States into which the power is taken?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not anything in the joint resolution about any rules or regulations to which the Government shall be subject.

Mr. KING. Let me see if I understand that. Then this power may be taken into the States and not be subjected to the control of the public-utility commissions of those respective States? It may be sold or delivered at a price which would destroy the private plants?

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that the public-utility commissions of the various States into which it might be taken would have the same control over it after it is disposed of to corporations, individuals, or municipalities that they now have; but the public-utility commissions of the different States, as I understand the joint resolution, would not have any power to control the Government of the United States or to fix the price at which the Government of the United States should sell this electricity to municipalities or private corporations.

Mr. KING. Then—and I am asking only for information—the Government of the United States in its activity is acting as a sovereign, not in a proprietary capacity?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. KING. It is not amenable, then, to the rules and regulations and laws of the States?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it is.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYSON. In my State of Tennessee the public-utilities commission has to give a certificate of convenience and necessity before a transmission line is erected. I should like to ask if that would apply in this particular case. Would the United States Government have the right to build transmission lines without the consent of or a permit from the State utilities commission?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think it would; yes, sir. There is nothing about it in the joint resolution; but I go on the theory that the Government of the United States could do that without obtaining the consent of any State or municipality.

Mr. TYSON. And could sell the power to whomsoever it pleased, at any price it chose?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. TYSON. Without regard to the public-utilities commission?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. President, it is provided in the joint resolution that the Government as nearly as possible shall distribute this power among the States within transmission distance equitably as between the different States. It is provided that in order to put the Secretary of War upon a business basis with anybody else, so that he can deal in a business way with any municipality or corporation, he shall have authority to build transmission lines. It is not made mandatory that he shall and it is probably not contemplated that he shall unless it becomes necessary. I think it is absolutely necessary to give the Secretary that power, because, as matters stand at Muscle Shoals, there is only one concern that has physical connections with that dam or with that steam plant, and that is the Alabama Power Co.; so that without this provision the Secretary of War could be held up. He would not be on an equal basis, so that he could deal as a business man could with his own property.

It is provided in the joint resolution that the revenue obtained from the sale of this electricity shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States, segregated there, and held as a special fund for the purpose of experimentation in fertilizer and for the development of fertilizer with a view of cheapening fertilizer to the American farmer. The Secretary of Agriculture has charge of the fertilizer, under the joint resolution. He is authorized to construct fertilizer plants anywhere in the United States, and is specifically directed to construct one such fertilizer plant at Muscle Shoals; and it is provided that steam plant No. 1, located at Muscle Shoals, and nitrate plant No. 1, shall be turned over to the Secretary of War, and enough houses and other buildings there to house the force and the employees that he may desire to put in charge at Muscle Shoals. In order that the Secretary of Agriculture may not be delayed in this fertilizer proposition, there is an authorization in the joint resolution of $2,000,000 that can be appropriated at any time by Congress for the immediate beginning of any building or the buying of any machinery that may be necessary to carry out the experimentation on fertilizer.

The Senate will remember, I am sure, that the original act that Congress passed, providing for the building of this dam and this steam plant—in fact, all of the property that the Government owns there—stated in one of its sections very explicitly that this dam should be used, that it was the idea of Congress and the purpose of the act to use this plant, for the manufacture of explosives in time of war and fertilizer in time of peace. It was further provided in the act that under no circumstances should this plant or anything connected with it ever be sold or leased to any private person or corporation.

We have had that original act in mind in framing this joint resolution. The committee is of the opinion, and I think I shall be able to demonstrate, that to carry out literally the statement of the original act in regard to the manufacture of fertilizer there by the use of nitrate plant No. 2 would be a useless waste of public money, because, as I think I shall demonstrate, the cyanamide process for the extraction of nitrogen from the air used in nitrate plant No. 2 is, for the purposes of fertilizer at least, obsolete; and that we will get much better results, much more fertilizer, and in fact enable the Secretary of War to improve and cheapen the production of fertilizer, if we use the income from this property down here for the purpose of experimentation with fertilizer. The amount of the appropriation authorized in the preceding joint resolution in the last Congress was $10,000,000, as I remember. In this joint resolution we have fixed it at $2,000,000. That reduction was made at the suggestion of Doctor Cottrell, the representative of the Secretary of Agriculture, who also suggested, and there are included in the joint resolution, several provisions in regard to what shall be done by the Secretary of Agriculture in the fertilizer business.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator, if he will turn to section 2, whether, in his judgment, under that section the Secretary of War could enter into the proposed contract, say, with the Cyanamid Co., except to cut down the period of the lease to 10 years? In other words, under the terms of this joint resolution, could he lease the properties to the Cyanamid Co. for a period of 10 years?

Mr. NORRIS. In a technical sense he might lease part of the property. As a practical proposition he could not do it, because in section 3 it is provided that—

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government to distribute the current generated at Muscle Shoals equitably among the States within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals.

It is also provided in another section that he shall give preference to municipalities, States, and so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then under section 2 could he, for instance, accept the offer made by the Associated Power Cos. for a period of 10 years?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not; no.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why not?

Mr. NORRIS. Because that would violate the section I have already read. Assuming that any municipality anywhere within transmission distance applies for electricity, it would violate that provision of the joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose before the municipality could make an application for it the Secretary of War should lease it, say, to the Associated Power Cos. or to the Cyanamid Co.; would not that end the matter for 10 years?

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, Mr. President, section 3 would obviate that. If there is any danger of such a thing happening, I am perfectly willing to agree to any amendment that will prohibit it. Of course, the Senator knows that I have not any such idea in my mind. The committee has not any such idea. The committee turned down the Cyanamid Co.'s bid in the committee, where it was offered as a substitute for this joint resolution. It received only two votes in the Agricultural Committee, and I believe the wisdom of that action can be demonstrated, and if the Senate will listen to me I will demonstrate it so that in the Senate it will not get a single vote.

Outside of all that, let me say to my friend from Tennessee that while the Secretary of War is given a broad discretion—and that is done purposely, because if you tie him up with conditions he will be in all kinds of difficulties and trouble—the Secretary of War certainly would not go so far astray from the real intent and purpose of this joint resolution as to lease that power to the Alabama Power Co., let us say, in a block or to the Cyanamid Co. in a block.

In the first place, it would be a violation of this joint resolution. In the next place, I can not conceive how he would do that even if it were not a violation, because in the last session of Congress the power people had their bid here; they had had it here in other Congresses; and it has never received the approval of the Senate, at least, in any case. The Cyanamid people have been before the Agricultural Committee ever since this thing commenced, years ago; they were before the joint committee that was appointed in the last session; and they have not received favorable action anywhere. So I can not conceive of the Secretary of War going to the extreme of violation of the real intent of Congress and doing such a thing, even if he had authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the Senator thinks that under this joint resolution municipalities, States, and counties would be given every opportunity to purchase the property, even if the Government had to help to build the transmission lines?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. One other question, if I may, while I am on my feet, about a different matter. As I take it, while the joint resolution does not say so in words, the effect of it would be to repeal that provision of the law of 1916 under which the dam was built, providing for the manufacture of nitrates at the plant.

Mr. NORRIS. It really carries out the intention of that law, but it has to be modified in order to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Modified to the extent of making it purely experimental, rather than providing for the manufacture of fertilizer?

Mr. NORRIS. The experiment is provided for, and the money given to the Secretary of War to carry on the experiment will be equivalent to that necessary to operate the plant on a manufacturing scale.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for the information.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I suggest to the Senator that in putting down his foundation, he tell the Senate how much was invested in the plant?

Mr. NORRIS. I will go into all that before I get through.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that will be very enlightening.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Along the line suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], suppose the municipalities of Alabama or Tennessee have already granted franchises to power companies over a long period of years and therefore are incapable, by reason of these contractual obligations, of taking advantage of this part of the resolution. Would or would not the inevitable result of the passage of the resolution then be to sell the plant to the Alabama Power Co. or other power companies?

Mr. NORRIS. If no municipality, no State, or no county makes application for this power, then, of course, it will have to be sold to the Alabama Power Co. or some other power company. The Alabama Power Co. probably will be one of the bidders.

Mr. BLACK. One other question. The law now provides that municipalities shall be given the preference with reference to the distribution of power, as I understand the law.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I appeared with a delegation before the Secretary of War last summer in an effort to obtain power from Muscle Shoals for the city of Muscle Shoals. That request was submitted by a delegation of from 25 to 50, perhaps some eight months ago. As yet there has been no reply; there has been no acceptance; there has been no rejection. Would this provision give to that same department the right to determine in the future whether or not the municipalities should get power?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to discuss that proposition.

Mr. BLACK. I am asking because I want to get the Senator's opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a perfectly fair question. I am not finding fault with it at all, and I want to answer it; but before I answer it I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that while I would like to see the municipalities within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals get all the power developed there, if they do not want it and will not try to get it, of course nobody can make them take it. We are doing nothing in this resolution but giving them the first chance. It would be unfortunate if a municipality that wanted the power had tied themselves up so that they could not take the power.

Since I reported this joint resolution I have received a telegram from the Senator's own State, from the city of Athens, in Alabama. Most of us know about the city of Athens, I think. In what county in Alabama is Athens situated?

Mr. BLACK. In Limestone County. I have the same telegram.

Mr. NORRIS. I have a telegram saying that the city of Athens and that county will, immediately, upon the passage of this joint resolution, build a transmission line to Muscle Shoals. That sounds pretty good to me.

Mr. BLACK. That is one of the few that the Alabama Power Co. has not yet gotten.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if the State of Alabama and its municipalities have mortgaged their souls and their lives to the Alabama Power Co. in such a way that they can not get out from under, there is no way I know of by which we can give them power, except through the instrumentality of the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has referred to transmission distance. What is reasonable transmission distance applicable to this plant?

Mr. NORRIS. I think about 300 miles. The power can be transmitted farther, but there will be somewhat of a loss. There is some loss at 300 miles. Of course, there is always a loss, no matter how far power is transmitted, but the Province of Ontario transmits electricity for practically 300 miles to supply the city of Sarnia and the city of Windsor, which sells it for homes at 2 cents a kilowatt-hour. So the transmission loss is comparatitvely small, even at that great distance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is rapidly becoming smaller, as scientific methods are being used in order to transmit the power without loss.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; there is no doubt but that new inventions and improvements in transmission are going to increase the distance to which electricity can be transmitted without loss.

For fear some one may read some other things I have said at different times about the relaying of electricity, I want to say to the Senate that there is a method of transmitting electricity much farther in a rather indirect way. For instance, in the State of North Carolina, which has some very fine hydroelectric properties, and where there is a very large concern that distributes power over a large portion of the State, I think it was in 1922 that the weather was dry, they had no rain, the creeks and the rivers commenced to dry up, and it became apparent that they were going to have a water famine; that the power plant was going to close down; that some of the cities that were supplied would be in darkness, and some manufacturing concerns would have to get steam or some other means to run their machinery. They were unable to get electricity from another large distributing company over the line in Georgia.

The Georgia company had all they needed over there, but none to spare. In the western part of Georgia there was another transmission company that had a large distributing system, but they did not have any electricity to spare. Across the line in Alabama was the Alabama Power Co. They had enough for themselves, but none to spare.

On the west or the northwest of the Alabama Power Co.'s territory was this big steam plant at Muscle Shoals, owned by the Government. This is what happened: They fired up that steam plant, with a capacity of 80,000 horsepower, and they gave to the Alabama Power Co., on the west side, some electricity. The Alabama Power Co., on the east side of its system, by pushing a button, gave the same amount of electricity to the Western Georgia Co., and on the eastern side of that company they in turn pushed another button and gave some electricity to the distributing system in the eastern part of Georgia. They in turn gave the same amount of electricity from their western side to North Carolina, and the industries of North Carolina continued to function. In reality, it was exactly the same as though they had transmitted electricity from Muscle Shoals to North Carolina, although that is beyond the transmission system. I think it is about 800 miles.

The Senator from Alabama asked me another question that I was going to answer, and if I have not answered it I will be glad to do so now.

Mr. BLACK. The question was as to what limitation there is on the exercise of discretion, and how long do the municipalities have before the Secretary of War can sell this power to the power companies?

Mr. NORRIS. There has been considerable criticism of the Secretary of War for the way he has handled the power down at Muscle Shoals. I have never joined in the criticism. I do not know that I would have handled it in the way he did; it seems to me the way of handling it might have been improved a little; but the Secretary was terribly handicapped. Congress had made no disposition of Muscle Shoals, or the power that developed there. The Secretary had on his hands that steam plant, capable of producing 80,000 horsepower. He had the Wilson Dam, capable of producing, in round figures, primary power to the extent of 100,000 horsepower, and at other times of the year 200,000 horsepower. We had passed no law providing for any disposition of the property and of the power produced.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator says that there was no law regulating it. As I recall, the law of 1916 provided that it must not be turned over to a private corporation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it did.

Mr. McKELLAR. In my judgment, certainly in turning it over to the Alabama Power Co., as the Secretary has been doing, he violates at least the spirit if not the exact letter of that law.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that he does. But none of us would have the Secretary of War do nothing with power that is capable of doing so much good, and bringing in an income to the Government of the United States. But since Congress has not legislated, he always had to lease that power on condition that he could terminate the lease at any time. I understand he leased it so that he could terminate the lease on 30 days' notice. If I had been Secretary of War, I would not have given much longer time than that to terminate the contract, if any longer, because he never knew when Congress was going to pass legislation that would direct him what to do.

That was not all. The Secretary was confronted with this proposition: The Alabama Power Co. was the only concern that was physically connected with the transmission machinery at Muscle Shoals. He was in the predicament that he could not lease it to anybody, we will say, for longer than 30 days, and we would not expect anybody to build a transmission line there if he could not be sure of a longer term than 30 days. So, while the Secretary may have done differently from what I or any other Senator would have done, I think under the circumstances he can not be criticized. He could not get as much for it as if he had been able to lease it for a term of years. Everybody knows that. No one could build a transmission line, or erect a building, on the theory of being able to get this power for only 30 days at a time. No business man would think of doing it.

It does seem to me, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama, that every one of the cities right within the sound of the roaring waters down at Muscle Shoals should be supplied with electricity and power from that dam. There is no question in my mind but that the city of Florence, located right there, and the other cities in the vicinity, ought to have the right to use that power, and I think they ought to have it in preference to giving it to the Alabama Power Co. But if I were confronted with the problem now, without any law, and wanted to lease the plant, I would probably be compelled to accept the terms which the Alabama Power Co. laid down to me, because they could easily say, "We will take it all, or none, and we will pay you such and such a price for it." There is no way to get more or to extend the terms of the lease.

If the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator thinks this joint resolution will not properly protect a city like Florence in getting its share of this electricity, if it is not protected as the resolution stands now, and there is any way to make it more certain, I would be glad to see the resolution amended so as to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I felt sure the Senator would. I do not want to be placed in the attitude of having risen a moment ago to criticize the Secretary of War. I do think that there has been considerable delay, when he has waited eight months to give a reply to the town of Muscle Shoals.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, too. I do not understand why there has been that delay. I can not explain it.

Mr. BLACK. There is surplus power going over the dam for which the Alabama Power Co. has not contracted. They are paying 2 mills per kilowatt and selling at 10 cents per kilowatt-hour right within a hundred yards, practically, of the place where the power is generated.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that proposition, too. I am in entire sympathy with it.

Mr. BLACK. I am wondering, if the joint resolution should pass, how long a time the municipalities would have before the Secretary of War would consider that the time had passed within which to obtain power and before he would pass it on to the power companies. I am wondering if the joint resolution provides for that contingency?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has called my attention to what I am inclined to think right now might be a weakness in the joint resolution. It does not fix any time. It leaves the matter entirely in the hands of the Secretary of War. It seems to me if I were Secretary of War and were trying to carry out the mandate of the Congress, as given to me if the joint resolution shall be passed, and the city of Birmingham, Ala., said to me as Secretary of War, "We have to vote some bonds to get a distributing system. We have to vote bonds to build a transmission line. It is going to take us three or six months. But we do not want to be placed in the attitude of doing all that work and then find that the electricity has all been disposed of to somebody else." I would say at once to the city of Birmingham, "If you start these steps I will hold out enough electricity, if there is such a demand that it is liable to be all gone, to supply your needs." I would not have any hesitancy in feeling that I was carrying out the real spirit of the joint resolution by doing that. If it goes across the line into Tennessee, and there are a great many cities in Tennessee within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals, and some city there said, "It will take us some time to do this," I would wait for them if they acted reasonably and fairly.

I want to say to the Senator from Alabama now that if the language is not explicit enough on that point, and it may be that it is not, I would welcome an amendment to make it explicit. If the Senate thinks best, let us have such a provision. If a municipality anticipates that it would take some time to get ready to do this work, let us fix the time in which they may do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is, fix the time in the joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason why I say that is that cities in my own home State; Memphis, for instance, may desire to make a contract of this kind with the Secretary of War. The legislature does not meet until next January and, of course, it can not get the money to build the transmission lines or to build a distributing system, if that might be necessary, in order to take advantage of the provisions of the joint resolution. It seems to me probable that it would be better to have a limitation fixed in the measure within which these cities might take advantage of its provisions.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to such a limitation. The only thing is that when we commence to curtail the discretion of an officer who has charge of a matter of this kind we may get him into difficulty of some kind that we do not imagine exists when we pass the joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. The mere fixing of a time limit would not have that effect, because as soon as it expired he would then have the powers which he would have now.

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary of War has authority to build transmission lines. If we were going to build a transmission line to Memphis, Tenn., as I remember my geography, if as a business proposition, which this is, we were going to build a transmission line to connect Muscle Shoals with Memphis, I would try to connect several other cities at the same time. Perhaps I would go over into Mississippi and come up that way. Perhaps I would go up the other way. If I were Secretary of War and if these municipalities were going to take the current, and if they did not have the money to build a transmission line, I would enter into a contract with them, if I had the assurance that it was legal, that they should pay for a transmission line as soon as they could, and I would then build it. If they did not pay, then I, as Secretary of War, would charge more for the electricity, because we would have to get something in the way of a return on the investment in the transmission line.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. TYSON. I would like to ask the Senator what idea he has in regard to the way the power would be equitably distributed among the States within transmission distance. Three hundred miles from Muscle Shoals would reach St. Louis. There would be at least a dozen States that would be affected by this matter. How would we manage to determine how much power should be given to each State and how much power should be given to each municipality so we would have some left for those who want a little more?

Mr. NORRIS. For who that wants a little more?

Mr. TYSON. Anybody that could get it at the price the Senator speaks of would want more of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am met on the one hand by a Senator from one State who says, "My municipalities have tied themselves up with the Alabama Power Co. and can not take any of this power. We had better let the Alabama Power Co. have it."

Mr. BLACK. The Senator did not understand me to say we should let the Alabama Power Co. have it, I hope. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the Alabama Power Co. is the only way it could be obtained in some instances. If your cities and your villages have tied themselves up and made a contract with the Alabama Power Co. for 10 or 15 or 20 years, and if they want to get some of this electricity, how can they get it except through the instrumentality of the Alabama Power Co.?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think they can very easily, and that is why I favor using that power, even though it cost something, for the manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can not get into any argument with me on the fertilizer proposition; but the Senator would not favor using the power to make fertilizer if fertilizer made with this power was going to cost a great deal more than it would to use the power for other purposes and to manufacture fertilizer in another way?

Mr. BLACK. I will answer that suggestion in this way: The Senator said "if it would cost more than to use the power for other purposes." If the power has got to be used by selling it to power companies at 2 mills, or anything like that, and letting the profit go to them instead of to the people, then I prefer to give the profits to the farmer instead of to the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather give it to the farmer anyway; but we are concerned with the proposition that there is no profit in it for the farmer. It is going to be a loss to the farmer. I do not want to take up that subject now, because before I get through I am going into detail, and I will convince any man, I think, who will give it fair and square consideration, that if we are going to use the Cyanamid Co.'s bid and use nitrate plant No. 2 to make fertilizer, we will have burdened the farmer with a useless expense, and we will have increased its cost to him. If he will buy the fertilizer after we get it made, we will have increased its cost to him and damaged him in every way and lost all the power besides. Later on I expect to discuss that feature of the question, and when I do I shall be glad to have anyone ask me any questions that may occur to him as pertinent.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not yet had time to study the bill carefully. I want to know if, under the joint resolution, all the power would be used that is necessary for the development of fertilizer? After the use of nitrates for munitions in time of war our people are principally interested in it for the manufacture of cheaper fertilizers for the farmers.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not expect it all to be used for the manufacture of fertilizer if the joint resolution passes, I will say frankly. If we use it all for the manufacture of fertilizer, we have done just what I said a moment ago. We have not given the farmer cheap fertilizer. We have not manufactured fertilizer and reduced its price one single cent. We can not use nitrate plant No. 2, I assert, and use 100,000 horsepower to operate it and make fertilizer that will be as cheap as the farmer can buy it to-day on the open market. If we can not do that, what is the use of piling up a lot of nitrate there?

But, again, I say I do not want to be led into a discussion of that feature of the matter now because I have a sort of outline in my mind of the way in which I want to take up these questions.

I did not finish answering the question of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON], and it is a very proper question. I am not finding fault with it. He said, if we can get power so cheap or electricity so cheap, all of these cities will want it. If every city within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals applied for power the Secretary of War could not supply them. I want to admit that frankly. There is not enough power generated at Muscle Shoals, even if we run the steam plant and Dam No. 2 to capacity, to supply every city within 300 miles of Muscle Shoals with all the electricity that they use. It is a good deal like a bank. If everybody went into a bank to-day to get their money, the bank could not pay it. The bank is operated on the theory that that will not be done. If it does happen the bank fails. That will not happen here.

We have all heard this said, and I know that is true of two States within transmission distance—at least the Senators from those States have told me so. One of them asked if I would consent to an amendment that we should give municipalities no preference whatever, and his reason for it was that so many of the municipalities in their State had been "gobbled up," as he put it, by the Alabama Power Co. and tied up with contracts so that they are not free to contract now. It is unfortunate if that is true, but I do not know how to remedy that situation.

The only way to give them electricity would be to give it to the Alabama Power Co.; but if we did that and wanted them to get a reduction in price we would have to put it in the joint resolution now before us, or they would not get it. We could adopt an amendment, and I would not object to such an amendment, providing that where the power is sold to a corporation distributing it over a territory as the Alabama Power Co. does, the Government official who made the contract would have a right to stipulate in that contract that, in consideration of his giving them the electricity, they were not to charge above a certain price named in the contract by the Secretary. I think the authority ought to go to some other official than the Secretary of War. In every bill I have had relating to Muscle Shoals I have had such a provision.

Mr. TYSON. How could he do that and how could it be applied to a corporation required to sell power at a price not fixed by any decision of the public utilities commission in the States?

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that the public utilities commission would not object to a reduction of electricity rates to the people of that State. I can not conceive if the Alabama Power Co. said to the public utilities commission of Alabama "We want to reduce our electricity rates to the consumers here from 10 to 5 cents," that anybody could believe that the Alabama Public Utilities Commission would say, "Oh, no; you must not do that. You might lose money. You would be selling it too cheap." I do not believe that would happen.

Mr. TYSON. Is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has not allowed a certain railroad in this country to lose money? Have not cases arisen where they did not permit railroad companies to reduce rates?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but without admitting that the powers were right when they would not permit Mr. Ford to reduce rates, I want to say it does not seem to me that proposition applies to this case. Here is a public utility corporation of Alabama or Tennessee which wants to reduce rates. It is proposing to reduce rates to all its customers. I can not conceive of a public utilities commission objecting to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Congress were to provide a maximum rate at which the current should be resold, say at 5 cents per kilowatt-hour, it would be very persuasive with both State commissions, I should think.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I do not seriously object to it, but the reason why I think it would be unwise to do it is that from my study of electricity and the prices charged the consumers in the United States I am convinced that in a place like Alabama or Tennessee and some other Southern States, but referring to those in particular which I know more about and to whose power possibilities I have given more attention, there ought to be no home which to-day should pay more than a maximum rate of 2 cents per kilowatt-hour for electricity in the home.

I believe it can be supplied and good money made at that rate; but I do not want at the present time to be led into that character of debate. Later on it may be that I myself shall take that up.

It is the theory of the joint resolution to put the Secretary of War in a position where he may act on a business basis, to put him on an equality with the individuals and corporations with whom he will have to deal in the disposition of electricity, and to give him every power and every discretion that a business man would have if he himself owned the property privately. If the Congress does not want to do that, then this joint resolution ought to be amended, I admit, but I believe it must be apparent to business men that we ought to put the Secretary of War on that kind of a basis.

It is not for the purpose of running anybody out of business; it is not for the purpose of any unfair or any unjust competition with any private concern; but if the power at Muscle

Shoals shall be distributed equitably, as this joint resolution provides—and there is quite a ground for dispute as to that, I admit, but we can not settle it; the Secretary of War will probably have some difficulty sometimes in carrying it out—but if the power be equitably distributed in a radius of 300 miles around Muscle Shoals not only those who will obtain this particular electricity will be benefited but also those who are supplied by the Alabama Power Co., or the Tennessee Power Co., or the Georgia Power Co., or the Arkansas Power Co., or the Mississippi Power Co., all of which will come in competition with the power developed at Muscle Shoals in localities which they are supplying. If as a consequence the people in that region shall get cheaper electricity—and I think they will—that fact will be as a shining light, and every other municipality and every other community, seeing what is going on, will then demand and obtain concessions from whomsoever is supplying them with electricity.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in order to prevent abuse by the Secretary of War—for, as the Senator says, there will be a great deal of difficulty in working this problem out—I was wondering if the Senator would object to an amendment to the joint resolution which would provide that in respect to States where the power is bought and sold the public utilities commission in those States should have the right to regulate the rates for the power sold at Muscle Shoals just as they regulate the rates of the private companies engaged in business in those States?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the public utilities commissions would have such power. I do not want to take it away from them; I would not want to give them the power to regulate the Government of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. The situation I have in mind is this: A private concern has invested its money and is now serving a certain community. It is easy to conceive of a state of affairs where the Government would be in competition with privately invested capital. If such privately invested capital is regulated by the State utilities commission, is it fair for the Government to go down there and say, "We can compete with that private capital and not be regulated"?

Mr. NORRIS. But it would not be competing; the Government of the United States would not be selling as a retailer. It would be selling to the municipality. The commission is regulating the rates there now, we will say, under the law. If this measure were passed, it would continue to regulate them just as it now does.

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose a private concern is selling current to a municipality and that the municipality should buy the unit of some other private concern and run its own selling company. Then if the Government attempted to sell current to that municipality, it would be competing with a private concern, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if it did that. If the municipality wanted to do that, and have two concerns selling electricity in the same town; of course, that would be for them to consider.

Mr. TYDINGS. But does not the Senator concede that it would be pretty hard on the invested capital that is already there?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think it would be an injury to invested capital. It would be regulated and the municipality with its electricity would be regulated. The public utility commission in control over the municipality would have the same jurisdiction that it now has, and if it thought putting the rate of electricity down to 2 cents a kilowatt would be unfair to the private company, it could compel a charge of 4 or 5 or 6 cents.

Mr. TYDINGS. The private company would have no competition except from the Government; perhaps no other group of men would want to go in there and invest capital to compete; but the Government would come along and say, "Here, we have already got this money invested"; and the private company would have competition with the Government, competition which was not regulated. It seems to me if I had my money invested in a transmission line serving some town and the Government came along in competition with me and sold current to that town, say, at a cheaper rate than that for which I could make it, simply because it was the Government, I would feel that it would be an indirect confiscation of my property.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Government is not going to do that under this joint resolution.

Mr. TYDINGS. How do we know the Government will not do that?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator see anything anywhere in the resolution that indicates to him that the Secretary of War is going, let us say, to the city of Florence and put in a distributing system and set up the necessary machinery so as to sell electricity to citizens of that town or to the power users of that town?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I do not; but the Senator must consider this situation: Suppose the city of Florence owns its own distributing plant and buys current from an electric company that is already established, and then the Government comes along and attempts to sell electricity to the city of Florence. In that case would not the Government be in competition with the people who were already on the ground?

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, let me——

Mr. BLACK. I should like to make a statement to show that that is not so in Alabama.

Mr. TYDINGS. I may be in error about it, but I am asking for information.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to take the Senator's own statement as he gave it, and let us see how it would work out. The Senator asked, Suppose the city of Florence owns its own distributing system and buys its electricity from the Alabama Power Co. and the Government comes along and sells electricity to the city of Florence, enabling the city to sell it to its citizens, we will say, cheaper than it is now selling the power obtained from the power company.

Why should not that be done Are we going to put anything in the way of the city of Florence using its own distributing system, if it can do so legally—if it has not leased it so that it can not recover it—and saying to the Alabama Power Co., "We are going to get electricity cheaper and we, therefore, quit patronizing you." That happens in every man's business life.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us put the shoe on the other foot. Suppose that the city of Florence owns its distributing system and that the Senator owns a company which he has built up with his money to serve the city of Florence with electricity, and, after he has all his money invested and all his transmission lines up to the city and is only charging a sufficient rate to yield him 7 or 8 per cent on his investment, then the Government comes along in competition with him and sells electric current at a rate which he can not meet; what becomes of the Senator's property then?

Mr. NORRIS. If I should consider that case technically, I would say, probably, that the Government was not treating me right.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is not the case.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Because the Government does not come along and compete. The city of Florence comes to the Government and says, "We want so much electricity," and it agrees with the Government as to how much it shall pay for it and then takes it. Suppose, now, that I, owning a power company somewhere, with a line that leads to that city, can not compete under the new arrangement; that is my misfortune; it is to the benefit of the city of Florence. Suppose the Senator and I were engaged in making cradles with which to harvest wheat and along comes an ingenious Yankee and invents a self-binder, and he goes out to the farmers that are using our cradles and sells them self-binders; are we going to be in a position to object? That is human progress; that is civilization; that is going on everywhere in the whole world. If I am engaged in selling electricity and somebody else comes along and sells it cheaper, I have got to suffer the consequence, unfortunate though it may be.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator will concede that there is a great deal of difference between two individuals who struggle against one another in competition and an individual who is up against the competition of the United States Government. The situation is entirely different. If some individual has the ingenuity and the enterprise to defeat me in business, that is one thing; but if the Government of the United States, with all its taxing power and money and absence of regulation, comes along and defeats me in business, that is an entirely different thing. It was that situation to which I was calling the Senator's attention.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that situation exists.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know why not.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the city of Florence did that very thing; suppose it had its distributing system and I was supplying it with electricity under the term of a contract limited to 10 years, and the 10 years expired on the 1st day of January. I do not own the distributing system. If the city of Florence can go somewhere else and get electricity cheaper, no matter where, or if it can itself make it cheaper, it is under no obligation to deal with me. If the Government of the United States went into the business and competed directly, I would feel differently about it; but I do not want it to do that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator let me interrupt him right there?

Mr. NORRIS. But the utilities commission of Alabama in the case the Senator puts would regulate, as I understand its authority and jurisdiction, the charges made by the municipality should pay as well as by the private concern. Suppose the municipality said, "We can reduce our charges for electricity from 10 cents"—I will inquire of the Senator from Alabama if he knows what the rate at Florence now is?

Mr. BLACK. It is about 10 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. NORRIS. Ten cents a kilowatt-hour. Any private company that has had a monopoly of the business at that rate for a few years can afford to be put out of business, because if it saved its money it will not need to work any more.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator let me interrupt him once more?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me go on with this illustration. If the city of Florence wants to reduce the rates for electricity, I assume it has got to get the consent of the commission to do so. If the commission may say, "No; that would not be fair; you have got to let this individual who has been charging 10 cents, which is twice at least what he ought to have had all these years, keep on gouging you and charging you 10 cents; we will not let you charge any less." It is practically necessary to do that in order to protect that individual, whoever he may be; I do not see any escape from it.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will concede that under some circumstances the Government might be competing with private electric companies. It was my purpose, inasmuch as there is a possibility of that kind of competition, to make the Government subject to everything that the individual is subject to, and, therefore, I think that we ought to amend this particular provision, if it shall pass, by providing that the Government shall have its rates regulated just as in the case of the competitor. I do not think it is fair to compel a private concern to take on a handicap on the one hand and then have the Government come out and compete with it. If the Government is going into the electric-light business, it ought at least to go into it on no higher plane than the individual goes into it. I do not know whether that will be possible, but I am arguing the theory of the unfairness of that kind of competition.

Mr. NORRIS. It had not occurred to me, I will say to the Senator, that the Government of the United States ought to subject itself to regulation by the State commission; I do not believe that would be proper; but I wish to say to the Senator that one of the things I have in view is competition. I want to reduce for the consumer the price of electricity.

Mr. TYDINGS. I realize that.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize, and I think every man who has studied the question realizes, that it is not practicable to bring about what is desired through public utilities commissions, as able and as competent as they are and as much good as they have often accomplished. The only way to secure reduction in rates is by competition of the municipality. That has brought about a reduction in every case where I have had occasion to look into the matter. I know from reductions which have taken place that the private concerns—there may be exceptions, of course—which are supplying electricity are charging, as a rule, more than twice what they ought to charge and what would be a sufficient compensation.

I did not intend to discuss this question now, but I have been led into it. In the first place, engineers when they are installing electric plants often say there is not anybody to take this electricity; it has no market; it is supplied now. I know there is a letter on file from the Secretary of War to the Senate—I think it was addressed to the Senate—in answer to a resolution of mine that the city of Washington was already supplied with electricity at a very reasonable rate by the corporation then engaged in furnishing it, and at that time the corporation was charging 10 cents a kilowatt-hour.

I do not question the honesty of the Secretary of War. At that time I did not know so much about the matter. He said it would be wrong to interfere with this corporation's business; but when I commenced to study it I found, and I know now, that that corporation that was charging 10 cents a kilowatt-hour was getting more than twice what it ought to have received; and upon the agitation of this question, upon its discussion in Congress and in magazines and in newspapers and elsewhere, that corporation recently, of its own volition, has reduced the cost of electricity.

I saw the same thing happen in the city of Omaha, where, even upon the threat of competition by a municipally-owned plant under the management of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL], the private plant cut down its electricity to 5 cents a kilowatt-hour.

The country is full of such illustrations.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator, and I just want to make this statement and then I will retire. I did not mean to say that the State was to have the authority to regulate the Government; but what I was trying to present to the Senator was the theory of the unfairness of competition unregulated as against competition regulated. I did not want to be put in that position without clearing up the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. The Senator does not seem to get my viewpoint, that we are not putting anybody in competition unregulated. The State regulation is going on just the same, except that I do not believe that we ought to permit the State regulation to regulate the Government of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. If the United States had sufficient power to supply all that section, then it would in a way confiscate the property; but the power is limited, and it would supply only a small per cent of the demand. I think that makes quite a difference between the two cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, Muscle Shoals is not going to supply one-tenth of the electricity that is needed within transmission distance. It is not going to put anybody out of business. As a matter of fact it will be a benefit, as history has demonstrated many times, to the fellows who are objecting to a reduced rate.

This is what happens when the rate is reduced: The consumer takes twice as much, three times as much, four times as much. It was stated on the floor of the Senate the other day that the average consumption of electricity in the city of Niagara, Ontario, just across from our city, was, as I remember—and I am speaking only from memory and may be wrong—298 kilowatt-hours per month. Right across the river on this side it was a good deal less than 100 kilowatt-hours; I have forgotten the exact amount.

I used to live in an eight-room house in the city of Washington, and my consumption was from 40 to 50 kilowatt-hours a month. If electricity had been reduced from 10 cents, as it was then, down to, let us say, 4 cents, the amount of electricity I consumed would have been four times as great. I would have cooked by electricity, I would have had an electric washing machine and an electric ironing machine and all the inventions known, because I could have afforded it. It would have been a good financial investment for me, if I were a poor man, to do it. But when electricity is 10 cents or 8 cents, or something of that kind, you can not afford to do it. It costs too much money and a poor man can not use it.

What happens? Here you have, we will say, a thousand customers. They use from 30 to 40 kilowatt-hours each a month. You collect a bill ranging from $1 to $2.50 a month from each one of them at a high rate of charge for electricity. You have to keep your books, you have all the overhead expenses, you have to go around and read each meter, you have to collect each individual bill, and it costs you just as much to read your meters and to collect your bills as though the amount were four times as great. When you reduce the cost of electricity the consumption goes up, and instead of collecting from the Senator from Alabama a bill of $1.50, he uses 300 kilowatt-hours instead of 40, and although the price has been cut in two his bill is greater. He keeps house by it. It is a hired girl if he keeps house. It is a hired man if he is running a farm. It does all the work and the labor about the house and the farm. If it is furnished cheaply enough so that he can afford it, he pays more money directly, and it does not cost a cent more to collect it, to keep the books, and everything.

It has often happened that that very thing has occurred. It has occurred in a contest between the regulatory body of a State and an electric corporation, where the corporation carried to the supreme court of the State the case of an order reducing the price, and the supreme court in passing upon it—and, I have no doubt, in the best of faith—held that the regulatory body could not cut down the rate at all, and nullified the order of the commission cutting it down, because they said the company could not afford to furnish the electricity any cheaper; that it was confiscation of property. Then, after that happened, the municipality in a very small way started to supply that city with electricity, and we saw the private corporation cut its own price right in two in the middle; and it has been making money ever since.

That has happened in hundreds of instances, both in the United States and in Canada.

So this reduction does not necessarily mean that we are going to put somebody out of business. My contention is, and I say frankly that that is what I think is in this joint resolution, that we will bring about a competition in the South by the distribution of this electricity over a radius of 300 miles that will cut down everybody's bill, whether he is getting it from the Government or from anybody else, and there will be no difference in the income of the private concerns.

I have in mind now a city that started in, as I remember, at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour in Canada. When a public plant was put in it cut down the rate to 6 or 7 cents the first year. The private company met it. The public plant cut down the rate again the next year, and the private plant met it. They kept on every year reducing the rate until they have got it down now to a point where the maximum is 2 cents a kilowatt-hour, and then it decreases so that everybody's average rate is less than 2 cents a kilowatt-hour, and the private company has met it; and I saw, not long ago, a report of the manager of the private corporation to the stockholders giving a glowing account of the wonderful prosperity they have been having in the last year. If you had proposed such a thing to them 15 years ago, when they were charging 10 cents, I suppose the manager would have honestly said, "If we go down to 2 cents a kilowatt-hour we shall be ruined"; but they have gone down, and they are still happy, they are still prosperous, and they are still making money and satisfied.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. BLACK. The hypothetical case put by the Senator from Maryland perhaps would not happen, for the reason that the power company in Alabama does not sell in bulk to the municipality. Athens, the city from which the Senator had the telegram, has endeavored in vain to get that privilege.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will not maintain that because they do not do it to-day, next year or two years from now or three years from now they may not be doing that very thing. We are passing this law for all time, and not just for the present.

Mr. BLACK. This law could be changed in two years or four years. I think it could be changed easier than you could get the Alabama Power Co. to sell in bulk to a city.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the hypothetical case I stated is a case that may come into existence at any moment.

Mr. BLACK. In line with that thought I wanted to make one other suggestion. I simply explained that to make it clear that they do not sell in that way. The suggestion is this:

In Alabama we have what is known as a tonnage tax on coal. When it is taken out of the ground, the producers pay a tax. The last legislature, after much effort, succeeded in imposing a tax on power that comes from the plants of the Alabama Power Co. There is a good deal of sentiment down there, expressed by the governor and others, that if this plant is operated for the distribution of power, and is diverted from what we conceive its original plan to have been—the manufacture of fertilizer—if it does go into the business of distributing power, the State should not lose the taxes which it should receive from any enterprise which comes from its own natural assets. I am just wondering, therefore, if under that provision the Senator would think it fair or just, if this joint resolution should pass, that the State should receive from this institution the taxes which it imposes on private enterprises?

Mr. NORRIS. Personally, Mr. President, if it were not for the principle involved, I should not have any objection. I remember that in a fight that was taking place in a western city over the question of municipal ownership, while I do not think you could provide by law for direct taxation of a plant owned by a governmental authority, I suggested to them that if I were engaged in it I would provide for the payment of a percentage of the gross income into the treasury, and let it be divided the same as though it were taxes.

It is of no consequence whether you pay it out of this pocket or whether they pay it out of that one. In the end it is just the same; but I can not conceive of the Government of the United States submitting its property to taxation by a State or a municipality.

Mr. BLACK. I, of course, understand that, and understand that that would be directly contrary to principle. I was here, however, a few days ago when a bill was passed at the instance of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], if I am not mistaken, in which it was provided that certain money should be paid to the State of Oregon, as I recall, by reason of the fact that that State had lost taxes from some public enterprise of the Government. If I am not mistaken, it was something about reforestation. Of course, a plan could be devised, if it was thought fair—and I think it would be fair—by which the State would receive its part of taxation, under whatsoever name called, of any enterprise which operates in the State. Of course, it could not be in the nature of taxation, because the State can not tax the Federal Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been down to that great Dam No. 2, and I have seen the lock worked, and have seen ships pass through it. I rode across it in an automobile when it was first opened up. Then I came back and listened to the Governor of Alabama when he made an argument in which he practically said, as I understood, that that was their property. He claimed that we had no right even to sell a kilowatt of electricity generated there. We did have a right, he said, to make explosives for the use of the Government, but we could not go into business, and we could not sell electricity.

The question of taxation is presented now by the Senator's question; but I remember that across the Tennessee River there for a distance of, as I remember, practically a mile, the Government of the United States has built one of the finest bridges in civilization—a broad, macadamized, solid concrete bridge—right on the top of that great dam. The Lee Highway, the famous highway of the South, passes over it. The automobiles and the teams and the horses and the men and the women and the children are using it every day, in business and in every other way; and I am wondering if Alabama is willing to pay the Government for that bridge that we built across the river.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am just simply submitting that matter to the Senator, because if this property should be leased for the manufacture of fertilizer the State would receive taxes, and if the Government manufactures power and distributes it as a business it would not.

I have not understood that the Governor of Alabama has ever claimed that they own the dam. I have studied his claim to some extent, and while I am not capable of expressing a legal opinion on it, there is certainly some basis in Supreme Court opinions for the claim which he made.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. BLACK. They say this, that for purposes of navigation the Government owns the river, but for other purposes the Government does not own it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. BLACK. But it has the right to use it for purposes of navigation.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the theory. I do not see how the Supreme Court can uphold that theory. But suppose they do. Then they will hold that while the Government of the United States has a right to build a dam in a navigable river for purposes of navigation, putting locks in it, to use it for any other purpose is illegal. You can not put a bridge over it for the people of Alabama to drive on. You have to go down and knock the bridge off the top. You have to go down and stop these machines that are making electricity. You have to stop that, unless you make explosives or use it for some other governmental purpose. I can not help thinking of a play of Shakespeare, in which Shylock was given, by order of court, his pound of flesh, but after he had sharpened his knife upon the sole of his foot to cut out his pound of flesh he was told by the judge that the law did not give him any right to draw blood, and that if he did then all his lands would be confiscate to the State of Venice.

The Government of the United States, says one side of this controversy, has a right to build a dam in a river for the purpose of navigation. Then it has a right, I suppose they will admit, to build that same dam for the purpose of flood control. That is all right. But they have not any right to put a bridge on top of that dam for people to use, they have no right to generate a single kilowatt of electricity, an incident to the governmental power. It is just an incident, it is a by-product, but we have not any right to do it. I do not believe any court in our land is going to cut in two governmental powers, divide those two propositions.

If we have a legal reason for building a dam in a navigable stream, either for flood control or for navigation, we have a right to utilize that dam for any purpose and for every purpose consistent with the civilized age in which we live. Those are matters that will all be settled by the courts, I suppose, in due time, and I doubt whether we can accomplish much by a discussion of them here.

I want to say just a word about the history of Muscle Shoals as it is connected with legislation. When this question first came to the Senate, it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I happened to be the chairman. If Senators will examine the RECORD they will find that I did not ask that that matter be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I stated on the floor of the Senate that the House had sent a similar bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. It seemed to me very appropriate to send the Senate bill to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. I did not want the job. I knew that ahead of us there would be a terrible contest, or I thought I could see it anyway, and it has turned out as I thought. I knew that it meant a burden we would have to bear for some time. I did not think it would last so long as it has lasted, but it has been with us for years.

At that time I knew nothing about the subject. I was not an expert on power, or electricity, or fertilizer. I would have been glad to have the burden taken off my shoulders. I knew that if it came to the Committee on Agriculture, being chairman of that committee, I would have a difficult problem to solve, and that it would be a difficult thing to handle.

So far as I know now, I had no prejudice, I had no preconceived ideas about it, I had not any pet thing I wanted to put over. I would have been glad to be left out of it. But the Senate put it on me, and I accepted it, as I thought it was my duty to do, and I went into it with the best of faith. There has never been a time when my people had any direct interest in it, and yet, after I had studied it, I went contrary to what the people down in that great section of the country thought ought to be done with Muscle Shoals. I was pilloried and criticized for quite a number of years because the people there thought, and honestly, I think, that I was standing in the way of human progress. But as time went on, I studied the matter more, and met what was then a wonderful propaganda in the name of the American farmer, what to-day is propaganda mainly in the name of the American farmer, and what I believe to be erroneous, and I took the position that I am now taking, but not on the same theory.

I had a vastly different plan. This bill before us is a compromise. I have compromised on most of my plan as to what I thought was the thing that ought to be done with Muscle Shoals, because I realize that legislation can only be reached by compromise. It will be remembered that the several bills, modified in some respects, which I have been trying to have passed through the Senate, provided for the development of the Tennessee River and all its tributaries from the mouth to the source of every one of the rivers.

It provided for a complete survey of the entire Tennessee Valley and all the tributaries of the Tennessee River, and the building and location of the dams wherever, in the judgment of the officials making the survey, they should be placed in order to produce three things—the maximum amount of navigation, the maximum amount of flood control, and the maximum amount of power.

The development of the maximum amount of navigation on any stream is conceded to be a governmental function. Flood control is likewise, I think, conceded to be a governmental function. Electricity comes as a by-product of those two, as an incident.

If we had carried out my plan—and I hope nobody will think I am taking an attitude of "I told you so"—if we had adopted the plan I first advocated, we would now have under construction a system for flood control that would be as complete and as scientific as can be devised by the ingenuity of man, that would fit into the national scheme for flood control as though it were made to fit. In fact, when you develop flood control and navigation and power, and coordinate the three, they will dovetail into each other as though they were made in the same mold.

We would have had navigation down there on the Tennessee River, and some of its tributaries, that would have been second to no other system of navigation anywhere on this globe. We would have had power, we would have had the maximum amount of power throughout the Tennessee Valley at the minimum cost, and the cost would have been divided among the three. It would have been the most complete, the most scientific, and the cheapest system for the generation of power in the world. There would not have been anything to compare with it anywhere. There is no reason why, if you take the Tennessee River and its tributaries and intelligently and scientifically build the dams where they will hold back the flood waters, where they will make the navigation and produce the power, you can not have the cheapest power in the world. Ontario could not compete with it. But you can not do it if you go at it haphazard. You can not do it if you let somebody pick out a place to build a dam, and he picks the best there is, and you let another build another dam, and he picks the best place left. They will not coordinate. They will not necessarily coordinate even in navigation.

Take, for instance, Cove Creek Dam, 250 miles from Muscle Shoals. I am going to discuss that at some length when I reach the proposition of the Cyanamid Co. I have never been there. It will hold back several million cubic feet of water. Nature has, I understand, provided a wonderful place for the building of a dam about 25 feet high that will hold back an immense quantity of water, and will produce a good deal of power. Suppose I as an individual take that for power, not caring anything about navigation, not caring anything about flood control, but wanting only power. Let us see how I would operate.

I would let out as near as I could a continuous flow, so as to give me as much primary power as possible, because that is the valuable power, good the year around. The result would be that I would be letting it out when, if I were considering flood control, I ought to hold it back. The result would be that I would let it out when, if I were considering navigation, I would hold it back, and when you wanted to increase the flow for navigation below I would not let enough out to help you out in your navigation proposition.

Suppose the Government owned it and it wanted to make navigation secure, wanted to make flood control secure, wanted to make Dam No. 2, and if we build Dam No. 3 make Dam No. 3 and all other dams down the Tennessee River more valuable. What would it do? It would put in the machinery to generate electricity, more of it than a private party would, because when it let the water out it would let it out at a more rapid rate. There would be times when there would not be any power developed. If the river were down in the summer time, if it were extremely dry, they would let out more water. When the water was let out, my water wheels would not be worth a cent the balance of the year. I would have a lot of secondary power and very little, if any, primary power.

If I were trying to dovetail these three things—power, flood control, navigation—then I would operate that dam at Cove Creek, so as to help navigation out when it needed more water, and hold the water back when there was too much, and hold back the flood when there was danger in the Mississippi Valley of flood. I would cooperate with the power proposition on Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3. Dam No. 2, as I will show in a few minutes, will develop, in round figures, about 100,000 primary horsepower. Yet there are times in some years when there is enough water going over that dam to make a million horsepower. Unless there is some way to regulate the stream, unless there are large steam plants as stand-bys, that vast amount of power, most of it secondary, is almost valueless; but if I had Cove Creek and I controlled it I would let the water out so as to help out Dam No. 2 and the other dams when the water was low, so as to hold back the water when the water was high and doing damage rather than good. It would all coordinate. It would all work together. By having a complete system under one control we would get the maximum amount of flood control, of navigation, and of power.

If you take Cove Creek Dam, which I have mentioned, and operate it in connection with Dam No. 2, to make the same amount of power the year around, you would get more power out of it, more primary power, even though Cove Creek Dam were out of commission three months in the year, and had no water whatever, because you would be using that surplus water over and over again. Of course, if you had only Dam No. 2, you would use it only once. Instead of having primary horsepower at No. 2 of 100,000, we would probably have 200,000 horsepower. We would have more than that primary power, much more, if in addition to Cove Creek we constructed other dams of a similar nature.

So, Mr. President, I want to make the point that to have a scientific development of any stream, particularly like the Tennessee, which is so long and has so much water at times and so little water at others and so many tributaries, if we make a scientific development of it, we will at the same time, all at once, get the maximum amount of power, of flood control, and of navigation, and that is what we want. God has so arranged it that everyone of these things works in with the others. To get the most power we get the most navigation; to get the most navigation we get the most flood control.

That is the dream that I had for the South. The former Senator from Alabama [Mr. Underwood], who used to be here, my close friend, I hope, for whom I have always had the highest regard, did not agree with me at all. He said I was a dreamer and that I was dreaming something. Now, flood control is prominent and we have lost the opportunity, at least to one of the greatest units in the Mississippi Valley, to have complete flood control. We are not able to get what I thought we ought to have, what the committee as a rule has stood for. We have come here with this joint resolution which is a compromise and does nothing but take care of the steam plant and Dam No. 2. It is not what I want. It is not what I think that country ought to have. So far as I am able to see, it is the best we can get. It is even now suggested that even this compromise measure will not pass.

What is Dam No. 2? The weakest point in the power possibilities at Muscle Shoals, and this is true of particularly every southern stream where the throw-off is rapid, is the immense variation in the flow of the stream. The flow of the river at some seasons of the year at Muscle Shoals is sufficient to produce more than 1,000,000 horsepower, while at its minimum flow the horsepower is less than 100,000. Gauge readings of the river had been carefully taken for a period of 50 years, and those readings show that the dam will produce power as follows:

Ninety-nine and four-tenths per cent of the time, 87,300 horsepower.

Ninety-seven per cent of the time, 100,000 horsepower.

Eighty-three and three-tenths per cent of the time, which is about 10 months, 141,000 horsepower.

Sixty-six and sixty-seven one-hundredths per cent of the time, about eight months, 205,000 horsepower.

Fifty per cent of the time, or about six months, 306,500 horsepower.

Twenty per cent of the time, or about two and one-half months, 600,000 horsepower.

Seven per cent of the time, or a little less than one month, 1,000,000 horsepower.

It will be seen at once that the power possibilities of this dam are dependent to a great extent upon some means by which either the flow of the river can be equalized by the construction of storage dams or by the use, in connection with the dam, of auxiliary steam plants, or both. It is quite evident that the cost of power is greatly decreased by any means that has a tendency to equalize the flow or the use of other power like a steam plant, to be used whenever the river is low to keep up the development of power.

The Government already has a steam plant at nitrate plant No. 2 capable of developing 120,000 horsepower; that is, it will be capable of doing that if the pending joint resolution is passed and the additional unit erected. As I understand it, it is 80,000 horsepower now.

Mr. TYSON. It is 60,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is thinking of kilowatts. I am speaking of horsepower. The steam plant at nitrate plant No. 1 is capable of developing 6,000 horsepower. By the use of those steam plants in connection with the water power developed at Dam No. 2, a great deal of secondary power can be converted into primary power at a very low cost.

Dam No. 2, as it is completed now, is the largest concrete dam in the world. There will flow over the top of it at the maximum discharge nearly three times as much water as tumbles down the precipice of Niagara. It is one of the greatest engineering feats of its kind ever attempted, and if the flow of the Tennessee River can be equalized by the construction of a storage dam it will stand in a class by itself as one of the greatest power-development projects in the history of civilization. The Government owns it. We have spent the taxpayers' money to get it. It is the property of the people of the United States. When we provided for the taking of the people's money to build it we said that we never would lease it to any private party or corporation. That has been the law ever since we began its construction. It has been the law while every dollar of public money was appropriated to build it and all the other facilities in connection with it. It seems to me that unless we can give a reason why it is not logical or fair or honest or economical to carry out that provision, we ought to adhere to it.

I think I ought to state right here, Mr. President, something about Dam No. 3. Senators remember, or if they do not remember they will find if they will look it up, that no one is asking for the right to build Dam No. 3. It is about 12 miles farther up the river than Dam No. 2. If it is built, it will back up the Tennessee River for 65 miles and make 65 miles navigable, much more navigable than it has ever been before, navigable at all seasons of the year, at all times; but, so far as power is concerned, it is an expensive proposition. Therefore I would say if I were a business man and had money to put into a power development and there was nothing in the dam but power that I would not invest my money in it. It is not an economical proposition. The dam there is much longer than Dam No. 2, but not nearly so high.

As we know, Dam No. 3 has never been constructed. I have investigated it. Engineers have sounded and made borings clear across the river and located it exactly, but we have spent no other money on it, so far as I know.

It will produce about 40 per cent as much power as Dam No. 2, but it will dam the river up much more. As a navigation proposition it is a necessity. As a flood-control proposition it is practically a necessity. Perhaps some day on those two lines alone the Government will build Dam No. 3. We can not expect private parties to build it unless we contribute a great deal on the flood-control item and the navigation proposition.

Dam No. 3 is not included in the pending joint resolution. We left out everything except, as the joint resolution undertakes to provide, to take care of the property which the Government now owns at Muscle Shoals.

The joint resolution here reported is a compromise, and has for its principal object the operation of Muscle Shoals upon a compromise plan set forth in the joint resolution, and which I have tried briefly to explain, and to have this operation for a sufficient length of time to demonstrate what is possible in a practical and economic method of cheapening fertilizer for the benefit of agriculture. Recent history has demonstrated that the extraction of nitrogen from the atmosphere has been gradually and systematically cheapened and that, in the scientific progress of cheapening the extraction of nitrogen from the atmosphere, less and less power has been necessary. At the present time modern scientific plans for the extraction of nitrogen from the atmosphere do not use water power. It is cheaper and more economical, under the present scientific methods, to use coal for such purposes.

No modern plant has been constructed in the United States in recent years where hydroelectric power has been used. I am referring now to the cyanamide process, the cyanamide process being the one provided for by nitrate plant No. 2. This is not because power produced by coal is cheaper than hydroelectric power. I want Senators to understand this. So often, when we locate a modern plant where there is cheap coal, we think we are going to use the coal for the power, and while we will have to have some power, yet power is a secondary proposition. This is not because power produced by coal is cheaper than hydroelectric power, but because coal in a way is the raw material necessary to the extraction of nitrogen from the air.

The coal is converted into coke and is not used for power purposes. The nitrogen is obtained from the air by eliminating from the atmosphere oxygen, its other element, and the coke produced from the coal is used for this purpose. We have an unlimited supply of nitrogen in the atmosphere, and in the atmosphere nitrogen is united with oxygen. If we could get the oxygen out of the atmosphere we would have left nitrogen, one of the ingredients of fertilizer, although it would be left in a state that the farmer could not use it. It would be a gas.

The only power used in a modern plant is the power that is necessary to operate the machinery. A nitrogen-fixation plant that would produce 40,000 tons of nitrogen a year—the same as that which could be produced by the operation of plant No. 2—would, under modern conditions and present scientific knowledge, cost about $10,000, whereas the construction of nitrate plant No. 2 cost a little over $55,229,000 for the bare plant. To this must be added the cost of Waco Quarry, which was a little over $1,273,000. Waco Quarry supplies the limestone, and nitrate plant No. 2 can not be operated without limestone, so that the plant costs a little over $56,502,000. This makes the plant complete, but without any power to operate it. The War Department, in giving the cost, includes the steam plant, which would make a total cost of a little more than $69,000,000; but inasmuch as the steam plant, which cost a little more than $12,555,000, can be used for other purposes and is absolutely necessary as an auxiliary in the operation of Dam No. 2, it is not included in the total cost of nitrate plant No. 2.

The power necessary to operate the machinery in a modern plant equal to the capacity of nitrate plant No. 2 would take about 16,000 horsepower, whereas the power necessary to operate plant No. 2 that we have at Muscle Shoals would require approximately 100,000 horsepower.

All this improvement in and cheapening of the process of getting nitrogen from the air has taken place since the war and since the construction of nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, which uses what is known as the cyanamide process. It seems clear, therefore, that it would be the height of folly and useless expenditure of public money to use the valuable power at Muscle Shoals for the operation of nitrate plant No. 2 in the production of fertilizer, when it is so clear that the same results can be obtained so much more economically and at so much less financial investment and expense by using the modern methods now known to the scientific world.

I might say, Mr. President, that no one claims, even in the most modern plant, that the problem has been completely solved. It is still under consideration; it is still being studied by chemists all over the known world; and in the building of every plant and in the operation, so far as I know, of every modern plant experience has developed something new that has cheapened the process and caused it to require less power.

It is quite clear also that nitrate plant No. 2, if operated to its full capacity, could not produce fertilizer as cheaply as it is now being produced in the general trade, and, therefore, its operation would prove of no benefit whatever to American agriculture, but would be a useless waste of power that might be used for the benefit of all classes of people within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals.

It should be added that scientific men in all parts of the world are working on the problem of still further cheapening the process of the extraction of nitrogen from the atmosphere, and it is fair to assume that the wonderful improvement that has been made since the war will continue and that the process will be further very materially cheapened. It should be added also that in all the improvements that have been made in the various processes the tendency has been, and still is, to use less and less power in the various improved methods for the extraction of nitrogen from the air. It has already reached such a point of development and improvement that power is but an incident in the process and that in the erection of a plant, cheap coking coal is of much more importance than cheap power.

In order to enable us to operate nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals in the production of fertilizer, at a price that would even compete with fertilizer as it is sold upon the market to-day, we would have to have power practically to the amount of 100,000 horsepower at from $4 to $6 per horsepower per year; and when we realize that this power, upon the market, is worth from five to six times that amount, it is quite apparent that nitrate plant No. 2 can not be economically utilized for the purpose of cheapening fertilizer to the American farmer.

The original act for the construction of the various governmental projects at Muscle Shoals provided that the power developed there should not be leased, sold to, or operated by private parties, and that such projects should in peace times be used for the cheapening of the manufacture of fertilizer.

In order, therefore, to carry out as nearly as possible the original intention of the act and to be at the same time in conformity with modern scientific knowledge upon this subject, the joint resolution as reported provides that the electricity developed at the governmental projects at Muscle Shoals shall be disposed of for the use, as nearly as possible, of the people living within transmission distance of Muscle Shoals, and that the profits derived therefrom shall be devoted to the construction of fertilizer plants and for the manufacture and distribution of fertilizer, and for experimentation in that field with a view of cheapening the production of fertilizer, thus carrying out the original intention of the act.

The dam and steam plant at Muscle Shoals have never been completed according to the original plans and specifications. In the dam there are some more power units to be installed. The place for the installation is provided and all the appliances of housing and foundation for such additional power units are complete and ready for the installation of the machinery. Since the necessary work for the installation of the machinery has already been paid for and since the power is there to operate the additional machinery and is at present going to waste, the committee considers it but good business to install this machinery. The steam plant is in practically the same condition. The buildings and foundations have all been constructed with the idea of putting in the additional machinery and, for the same reason, the committee believes that this additional machinery should be installed and that it is an economic loss, both as to the steam plant and the dam, not to install what has already been provided for and the main expense connected with it already paid.

The present conditions at Muscle Shoals are very unsatisfactory. The Secretary of War has no authority to enter into contracts for the sale of the electricity generated there for any specific definite term. Contracts for the sale of electricity must contain a provision that the Secretary of War can terminate them on short notice and that such contracts are always made subject to any action that Congress may take in the disposition or the control of the governmental properties at Muscle Shoals. He is, therefore, unable to obtain a fair and reasonable price while Congress is debating the question and trying to reach an agreement upon what shall be the permanent policy of the Government. He has another serious handicap. There is in reality but one customer for the electricity which the Government generates at this plant, and that is the Alabama Power Co. This is because the Alabama Power Co. is the only company, either governmental or private, that has any physical connection with the generating system owned by the Government at Muscle Shoals. In order to place the Secretary of War upon a fair business basis to secure reasonable prices for the electricity generated at Muscle Shoals, the joint resolution provides that he may make such contracts for a period of 10 years and that he has the authority to construct, or permit to be constructed by others, transmission lines that will connect Muscle Shoals with other possible bidders for the current generated.

In order that the Secretary of Agriculture need not be delayed in the construction of fertilizer plants while a sufficient fund is accumulating from the sale of electricity the resolution authorizes an appropriation not exceeding $2,000,000 for the immediate commencement of the construction of fertilizer plants, either at Muscle Shoals, or elsewhere.

The resolution makes it obligatory to construct one of such plants at Muscle Shoals, and provision is made for turning over to the Secretary of Agriculture of a part of the properties of the Government at Muscle Shoals, and also for supplying to the Secretary of War any additional power that he may need. It is believed, however, that but little, if any, of the power generated at Dam No. 2 will be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for such purpose, because, in the progress of scientific investigation and study, power has become a minor item in the construction of a fertilizer plant; and I feel, therefore, that by the sale of the electricity generated at Dam No. 2 and at the Government steam plant at Muscle Shoals the profits accumulating from such sale will result in a much cheaper production of fertilizer than though the power itself were used in the production of fertilizer according to the methods that are now obsolete and out of date.

Later on, Mr. President, I am going to take up in detail the fertilizer proposition. I shall endeavor to establish by scientific evidence that the statements I have briefly made so far are all true and are demonstrated by scientific facts; so that, in my judgment, there is no doubt whatever that in some way we ought to utilize and dispose of the power that is developed at Muscle Shoals and ought also to utilize the proceeds for the purpose of improving the processes for extraction of nitrogen from the air and also for the improvement of the manufacture of a mixed fertilizer.

We must remember that when nitrogen is extracted from the air we have only one ingredient of fertilizer, whereas there are two ingredients that we must have in addition to nitrogen. We must also have potash and we must also have phosphorus. While we can get nitrogen in unlimited quantities, so far as the supply is concerned—for it is obtained from the atmosphere—the process of getting it from the atmosphere is still very complicated, although it has been much improved since the World War. The process of securing nitrogen from the atmosphere has been going on for a great many years. Formerly the only process known was the arc process, developed mostly by the Swedes and Norwegians. It required an immense amount of power. There are still some arc plants. It would not be profitable to erect one here. We can still obtain nitrogen by the arc process, but our power is too valuable to permit us to use it in that way.

Then the cyanamide process was invented. We knew about that at the beginning of the World War, and then, because it was necessary that we should have explosives, our Government constructed nitrate plant No. 2, and it was operated for a while. It has been demonstrated that it can produce 40,000 tons of nitrates a year; I do not think anybody disputes that. Nor does anybody dispute that it will take practically 100,000 primary horsepower to do it. We knew when we built that plant that there was an improved process; our scientific men knew that Germany had a better process; and they constructed nitrate plant No. 1 down there, a much smaller plant, and a steam plant of 6,000 horsepower to operate it. It was a failure. The building is there; the machinery is there; but they were never able to do anything with it.

The truth is that our chemists knew that it was somewhat experimental or they would have constructed it on a larger scale. It was an experiment and they made a failure of it. I am not criticizing the expenditure of money; I am not criticizing our men who constructed it. I think they were justified in doing it. They were rushed at that time. They knew they could get it under the cyanamide process, but they knew that that process required a vast amount of power. They knew there was a better process and they experimented to get it. They succeeded with the cyanamide process. They failed with the other.

When the war was over we went into Germany. What Germany knew became the knowledge of our scientific men.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator gets to that proposition I should like to ask him a question. The Senator contemplates, however, pressing the amendment which he has had printed, providing for the Secretary of War to lease nitrate plant No. 2 either to the American Cyanamid Co. or to the American Farm Bureau, I think it is, or to anyone else, without rental cost, and to permit them to procure enough power to operate this plant efficiently, does he not?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I shall offer it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator introduced it and I thought he was going to offer it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to its being offered. Before I get through with my analysis of the Cyanamid Co.'s bid I expect to prove, if Senators will listen to me, that it is perfectly futile; and I would rather pass it as a separate proposition. I hate to put on a thing that I myself believe to be foolish. I will say to the Senator that I do not want to debate it now.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator believe, too, that the American Cyanamid Co. in fact care nothing about getting that particular plant but want to get the power developed there?

Mr. NORRIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARRISON. And they are using that as an excuse to get it?

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any doubt about it, and I think I will demonstrate that before I get through.

When the Senator interrupted me I was saying that when the war was over we discovered that Germany was getting nitrogen from the air and that she had been doing it under what is known as the Haber process, an improvement over the cyanamide process. Our chemists visited Germany, became acquainted with what was going on there, and experimented here. Our own Government official, Doctor Cottrell, has done his part—and it has been a great part—toward the improvement and cheapening of the method of getting nitrogen from the air. Doctor Cottrell's inventions are known by chemists the world over. He is held in the highest esteem for the inventions and improvements that he has made. Immediately our chemists and chemists in other parts of the world improved upon the process that Germany had, the Haber process, and they have continued to improve on it until to-day they have all kinds of modifications of it; and every improvement that is made has used less and less power.

The steam plant—I think I have already stated this, but for fear I have not I will state it now: I have a notation of it here in my notes—the steam plant at Muscle Shoals has a capacity of practically 80,000 horsepower. When the additional unit is put in it will have a capacity of about 110,000 horsepower; I think, a little over that. I have seen some statements that it would have 111,000 horsepower. Dam No. 2 at present has four generating units of 30,000 horsepower each. They have four units at 35,000 horsepower, making a total installed machinery in Dam No. 2 of 260,000 horsepower. The plans provided for 10 additional units at 35,000 horsepower each, making a total installation of power, if this joint resolution passes, that will be completed and the machinery put in of 610,000 horsepower in Dam No. 2.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. Is it the Senator's understanding, or has he any information to the effect, that they will ever have that much primary power 100 per cent of the time? Is that possible?

Mr. NORRIS. I doubt myself whether it is possible. I will say to the Senator that nobody knows definitely just how much primary horsepower may be developed there; but you will notice that if we have a 110,000 horsepower steam plant we can convert 110,000 horsepower of secondary power into primary power by operating that steam plant a very small portion of the time. It is almost all clear gain. When you can convert secondary power into primary power, it comes nearer to making something out of nothing than anything else I know of.

When the other dams are built, when the Cove Creek Dam is built, as I hope it will be some time, and other dams are built holding back the flood waters, it will always increase the primary power at Dam No. 2. As to how far we will ever be able to reach in primary power at Dam No. 2, nobody can tell.

Another way of increasing it is this, and it seems to me it ought to be done, and if I had my way I would do it at once: Instead of adding 30,000 more horsepower to the steam plant, which this joint resolution will do, and which will complete the steam plant there, I would build another steam plant. I would build a steam plant of 100,000 or 150,000 horsepower, because every time you do it you are able to convert secondary power into primary power. Of course, the most valuable secondary power is that which comes the nearest to being primary power. In other words, if Dam No. 2 will make 100,000 horsepower 97 per cent of the time there would just be that difference of 3 per cent of the time that you would have to supplement it with something else, and that additional 3,000 horsepower would become primary power the year around, and would cost you practically nothing.

Mr. President, I have here rather a detailed statement of the various kinds of boilers and things we want to put in, more or less technical, prepared by Mr. Merrill, the secretary of the Federal Power Commission, which I think answers even the technical questions that might be asked.

He says, for instance:

The existing and ultimate installation at Dam No. 2 is as follows:

Ultimate, 18 units. The power house is constructed with wheel pits for 18 units, or an ultimate installation of 610,000 horsepower—in turbines, and with a combined rated generator output of 550,000 kva., which at 8/10 power factor is 444,000 kilowatts, or 595,000 horsepower.

Mr. President, I have spoken of improvements in methods of extracting nitrogen from the air. There are quite a number of such plants built in the United States, all of them since the war, all of them since the construction of cyanamide plant No. 2. There has not been another cyanamide plant built in this country. I will discuss the cyanamide part of it more in detail after a while; but right now I want to call attention to what the scientific world has been doing in the construction of plants to take nitrogen from the air.

The du Pont powder people, who need a whole lot of nitrogen in the manufacture of explosives—they are engaged in that business on a purely business basis; they have nothing in it but business—wanted a plant to get more nitrogen. They looked over the country to find a location. They could have extracted nitrogen by the cyanamide process. They could have gone to hundreds of places and gotten cheap water power in the United States. People would have been glad to have them come and locate there; but they were going to do business on a business basis. What did they do? Where did they go? They went down to West Virginia, where they could get cheap coal or cheap coke, and they established a plant down there.

I went down to see their plant. I went down to look it over. While I was not a chemist or a scientific man, I had looked over so many plants that I thought I could get a better idea of what they were doing if I went down there and looked it over, and I did. I took with me Major Burns—I think the members of the Agricultural Committee will all remember him—who sat with us in all the hearings. He is really an expert, and everybody on the committee had unlimited confidence in his judgment and in his word.

I found him to be absolutely trustworthy; and, at my request, after we had been dealing with Major Burns, I had him detailed to sit with the committee, and he did, during all our hearings on Muscle Shoals. When I went down there to look at this other plant I took him with me. I made two trips to Muscle Shoals, and had him with me both times, and I took him with me to look over this du Pont powder plant. He gave me, and could give me, a whole lot of information; and, while no such thing was attempted, if anybody had attempted to deceive me or to practice any deception on me, he would have been able to detect it if I did not.

We were treated very nicely, however. When the du Pont people found out that I would like to see the plant, they sent me an invitation to inspect it. They said they would be glad to show me everything they had. They had no secrets. They sent one of their chief chemists from Wilmington, Del., to go down and be there when I was there; and we went down and went all through the plant, and examined it in detail.

They are people who are starting out, just as we are, to get nitrogen from the air. We ought to learn a lesson from the business world; and, Mr. President, though some people may not believe it, I claim to be a believer in good business. I do not want the Government to do anything except on a good business basis, and I do not want the Government to use its money and squander it in something that is not good business, even though we may be able to fool the farmer while we are doing it; and so I went down to look at this plant.

The plant down there manufactures liquid ammonia, using the Claude variation of the synthetic process. There is the Haber process. There is the Claude process. All these processes are called synthetic processes; and this is a modification, a better plant than they have in Germany. I have an idea that it is as near up to date as any plant in the world to-day; and they have changed it to some extent since they have been there. They showed me several places where they had torn it down and built it up again in an improved way; and they are changing it, they are improving it, all the time.

The plant manufactures liquid ammonia, using the Claude variation of the synthetic process, in which the two raw materials, hydrogen and nitrogen, are welded together under a pressure of 1,000 atmospheres. The hydrogen is obtained from water by breaking it down into its elements—hydrogen and oxygen—through the medium of hot coke in the same kind of water-gas plant that supplies so many of our cities with gas. The oxygen is then eliminated. The nitrogen is obtained from the air by eliminating through burning and purification its other element—oxygen. The mixture of the two gases is purified and then passed through a catalyzer under the pressure of 1,000 atmospheres and at high temperature, when the chemical compound, ammonia, is found.

The plant was erected as a pilot or demonstration plant. It is now operating on a basis of 20 tons of ammonia per day, but has a capacity of approximately 25 tons of ammonia per day. This latter rate approximately equals one-fifth of the nitrogen fixation capacity of United States nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, Ala. The plant has proven successful from the standpoints of quantity and quality of output and cost of product. It is so constructed as to permit of ready expansion to some four or five times its present size.

I have been told in a conversation with one of the officials of the company that since I have been down there they have practically decided that they will double the capacity of that plant in the near future. Plans for expansion have been made, but the execution of the plans depends upon business conditions.

The nitrogen fixation plant, such as the one at Charleston, having a production of approximately 40,000 tons of nitrogen a year, would cost about $10,000,000 for the plant construction itself.

Power is used in this plant only for the operation of machinery and for lights. To maintain a production of 25 tons of ammonia per day, power to the extent of approximately 3,500 horsepower is constantly required. If the plant had the output of United States nitrate plant No. 2, power to the extent of some 16,000 horsepower would be required. The operation of United States nitrate plant No. 2 requires approximately 100,000 horsepower, as I have before stated. The plant was located at Charleston primarily because of the availability of cheap coke, which in turn requires cheap coal.

The same company has a plant on Puget Sound, where hydrogen is obtained from water by separating it into its elements with electricity. If hydrogen is obtained by the electrolysis of water, approximately seven times as much power is required as when hydrogen is obtained from water through coke. The experience of the company is to the general effect that hydrogen, which is by far the more expensive of the two raw materials, can be obtained at about the same cost through the two modifications of the process when coke sells at approximately $4 per ton and power sells at approximately $5 per horsepower year.

There you have the comparison. No man in his right senses, Mr. President, if he had power any place within a reasonable radius of our cities, or any of our plants of production and manufacture, would sell power at $5 per horsepower per year if he could get $30.

In many regions in the East coke can be obtained at the figure quoted—$4 per ton—but firm power can scarcely be obtained at less than four or five times the price quoted; indeed, I think it would be more accurate to say at not less than five or six times that price. In spite of the fact that coal is quite expensive in the Puget Sound region and power is relatively inexpensive, the electrolytic hydrogen obtained at the Puget Sound plant costs considerably more than the coke hydrogen obtained at the Charleston plant.

In other words, with this modern plant, there are various modifications, and they have a plant out in the Puget Sound country where power is comparatively cheap, where coal is high, and there they use more power, because they use the other process, which is another modification of the Haber or synthetic process. Yet, with their cheap power there, the manufacture is not nearly as cheap as when the product is made from coal in Charleston, W. Va.

The company in Charleston is shipping a large part of its product—liquid ammonia—in tank cars to one of the du Pont explosive plants near Wilmington, Del., where it is converted into nitric acid and used in the manufacture of explosives. It thus replaces Chilean sodium nitrate, which for many years has been the sole raw material for the manufacture of nitric acid. This is a very important step from the standpoint of national defense. The company seems to feel that within a year or two the du Pont Co. will be making practically all of its nitric acid from ammonia, and that industry in general will likewise have largely substituted ammonia for Chilean sodium nitrate in the manufacture of nitric acid.

Nitrogen in the form of ammonia can be easily and inexpensively shipped because of its liquid state and very high concentration. Ammonia contains approximately 82 per cent of fixed nitrogen and is the most concentrated nitrogen compound known.

The company seems to feel quite enthusiastic about the future of nitrogen fixation in this country by means of the synthetic ammonia process.

Mr. President, there is a plant still larger than the du Pont plant, of the Allied Chemical Co., I think, though I may be mistaken about the name, now under construction at Hopewell, Va. I understand that it is several times larger than the plant at Charleston. They are using the synthetic process.

There is a plant at Syracuse, N. Y., I think the first one constructed in this country, using the same process. There are quite a number of others. But there are now under construction in the United States these large plants, constructed for the purpose of getting nitrogen from the air, and not a single one of them uses the cyanamide process.

Can there be a better demonstration for practical business than that, where men engaged in doing the thing we want to do to help agriculture and doing it as a business proposition, on a business basis, are operating in that way? Do we want to set up the Government of the United States in defiance of business experience and follow a plan that is obsolete and that will cost many times as much to operate in order to get nitrogen from the air?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the plant being established at Hopewell, Va., is to be perhaps the most extensive plant of the kind ever established anywhere, and those who are interested in it tell me very confidently that it will produce an infinitely greater amount of nitrogen than Muscle Shoals is capable of producing.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his interruption and for his statement. I have never been to Hopewell. I do not know how far they have gotten along. If they had had their plant completed, I would have gone down there after I had been to Charleston, because, in answer to the propaganda that has been going on for the last year over the United States to line up the farmers in favor of the cyanamide bill, and, as I am going to demonstrate, in which the American Farm Bureau Federation was misled and deceived by their Washington representative, which I think I will prove as nearly as anything can be proven outside of mathematical demonstration, I wanted to equip myself. I wanted to be prepared to say that I had gone into these business concerns where they were moving along on a business basis, and found that they would not think of such a thing as getting nitrogen from the air by the cyanamide process.

I invited one of these chemists to come to my office, and I said to him, "Suppose I had the authority now, and I gave you Dam No. 2 and nitrate plant No. 2 for nothing, and you wanted to get nitrogen from the air; what would you do?" His answer came back in a flash, "I would sell the power on the market, and go where I could get cheap coal, and build a synthetic process plant to get it."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wanted to ask the Senator a question for information. I take it that most of the nitrogen that is being extracted from the air is being produced for the purpose of making explosives.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, it is; that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Only a small percentage of it is sold as fertilizer to the farmer. I wanted to ask the Senator whether up to this time the price of nitrogen extracted from the air has been reduced below the price of nitrogen furnished from the mines of Chile. Is it not still true that the farmer can get his fertilizer from the mines of Chile at a lower cost than that at which he can get it in the American markets, through the nitrogen extracted from the air, and that Chilean nitrate is very much better and very much safer than that which is secured in the other way?

Mr. NORRIS. As a fertilizer proposition, I should think that was true, but the du Pont people say, as I remember it, that they are getting practically all of their nitrogen now through their own process, and getting nothing from Chile. But, of course, the Senate must remember that when we are speaking of nitrogen, and getting it from the atmosphere, we are still a good ways from fertilizer. We still have a long road to travel before we could get a fertilizer which the farmer can use.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I desire to make is this, that it is of no benefit to the farmer to have these commercial concerns extracting nitrogen from the air, if after they have extracted it the farmer has to pay more for it than he would have to pay if he bought it from abroad. The theory of those of us who have insisted that the Government should manufacture nitrogen for the farmer was that we might make it possible for the farmer to secure the product essential for fertilizer at a cheaper price than he is now paying for it. It does no good for him to secure an abundant supply if it costs more than the price he would have to pay elsewhere.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that it is correct. But this resolution in my judgment paves the way, if it is scientifically possible, and I believe it is, to get cheaper fertilizer, by experimentation and manufacture by the Secretary of Agriculture on a large scale. He will use all the funds that come to him from the sale of electricity and power at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has just attempted to prove that the production of nitrogen from the air has enormously increased in recent years.

Mr. NORRIS. It has.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the price has not gone down.

Mr. NORRIS. The price of nitrogen has not?

Mr. SIMMONS. The price has been maintained. There never has been any trouble on the part of the farmer in getting a sufficient supply of nitrogen. It was not his complaint that he could not get a sufficient supply, but his complaint was that he could not get it at a reasonable price. This enormous increase in production through private enterprise apparently has not resulted in reducing the price below what it was before.

Mr. NORRIS. The price of nitrogen, I think, is down.

Mr. SIMMONS. No. There may be some years in which it is down, but this is not one of them, and year before last was not one of them. I think it was down a little bit last year.

Mr. NORRIS. I know we are getting nitrogen from the atmosphere now at practically one-half of what it cost to get it from the air before the war or immediately after the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the question. I have no doubt they have reduced the cost of production. I have no doubt that they will continue to reduce the cost of production. The question I want to get at—and that is the only purpose I have in interrupting the Senator—is whether they have yet got the price of synthetic nitrogen down as low as the price the farmer has to pay for a material equally as good and better that he imports from a foreign country.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I do not know what the prices are which prevail in certain plants, but I am told by various trustworthy parties interested in the plant now being constructed at Hopewell that that plant is not to make nitrogen for explosive purposes, but largely, if not exclusively, for agricultural purposes. It is to be constructed and operated by a corporation with unlimited financial means, and I am told that they are to produce and sell the nitrogen at one-fourth of its now prevailing price.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to get that information. My information was—and I am speaking only from memory, because I did not make a notation of it when I was at Charleston—that they were producing nitrogen at practically one-half what it used to be. But, as I said, we have not reached the zenith, we have not reached the limit yet of cheapening the process of producing nitrogen. I have no doubt that the people in Hopewell ought to do a lot better than the people of Charleston, and will keep on improving.

But I do not want Senators to get the idea that that settles the fertilizer proposition. We might get the nitrogen for nothing, but if our phosphorus and potash cost too much, it might be even increased over the present prices. To get fertilizer we must have phosphorus, potash, and nitrogen, and we are dealing here with only one of the ingredients.

If the joint resolution is passed, the Secretary of Agriculture will use these funds not only to cheapen the extraction of nitrogen from the air but to cheapen potash and phosphorus. Perhaps there can not be so much done for phosphorus, but there is a great deal to be done in cheapening potash production. We have spent millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States in different parts of the country trying to locate potash beds. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I have helped to report to the Senate several bills, and under those bills we have spent enormous amounts of money and have located potash beds in large quantities. None of them, however, seems to be practical for development now because the development would cost more, unless the method of getting it out of the ground is improved, than it would cost to get the potash elsewhere. We go now mainly to Germany for our potash.

To locate a fertilizer plant, to get cheap fertilizer, we must have in view several things—the cost of nitrogen, if we get it out of the air, which will depend on cheap coke, the cost of phosphates, and the cost of potash. If we locate the plant far inland, the potash which is shipped from Germany will cost a great deal in the way of railroad freight, which will be much more expensive than ocean freight. Then we must locate the plant as near as possible to the people who are going to use it. When fertilizer is mixed, it is heavy, and the freight is an important thing to the consumer, who must pay the freight after it is manufactured.

There are quite a number of things that must be taken into consideration in the location of a plant for the manufacture of fertilizer. It may be, if we had a location where we had cheap coal far inland, that to ship the potash from Germany would cost too much; and that if we would locate the plant on the seaboard, at a harbor, to manufacture nitrogen and ship it by rail, instead of locating the fertilizer plant where we manufacture the nitrogen, it would be better. The du Pont people do most of their manufacturing at Wilmington, Del. They get their nitrogen from West Virginia. It is shipped up there in liquid form in tank cars. There it is utilized. The place where they use it is hundreds of miles away from the place where they produce it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator, because there are three elements in this product, nitrogen and potash and phosphate, that the potash situation is rather difficult because, as I understand, there is a German trust that controls the price.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have understood so.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope we can discover something over here which will make us independent of the German trust.

Mr. NORRIS. We did discover some during the war and we have it yet, but the cost in these times is more than it costs us to get the potash from Germany.

Mr. FLETCHER. The phosphate situation, as I understand it, is this: I think Florida produces something like 86 per cent of all the phosphate mined in this country. We have both the hard rock and the pebble phosphate. Those mines in Florida are having rather a hard time because their foreign shipments are limited and cut off and reduced by reason of the discovery of phosphate in Algeria. France is very largely taking away the market in Europe that Florida phosphate producers had. The mines in Florida now are producing it at as low a price as I think it can be produced anywhere. In fact, some of them are not operating on account of the diminution of their foreign market. I do not think we are going to get a much lower cost of phosphate, so far as that is concerned, than we can get now.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are going to locate a plant to get the phosphates from Florida, let us say, and locate it at Baltimore, we would have most of the way ocean freight. I am trying to think of this as a business man would think of it. Baltimore is pretty well located to supply people who use fertilizer. It is in a country where the shipments would be comparatively small. It could not supply the whole country with one plant, because the freight would be prohibitive. It would get its phosphate from Europe. I understand Florida phosphates are mined very cheaply. Most of the haul would be by water at cheap rates. Such a plant would get its potash from Germany. That would be a water haul and cheap. But it could not get its nitrogen in the vicinity of Baltimore very cheaply because coal is too high there. It might locate, as the du Pont people did, down at Charleston, produce its nitrogen down there, and ship it up in tank cars.

All these things, if we are going to locate a fertilizer plant, have to be taken into consideration, and not the least of them is to locate the place where fertilizer is finally made in a territory that is going to use the fertilizer.

I want to say one word, and then I am going to quit for the day. It seems to me I ought to say this in connection with what I have said about getting nitrogen from the air either by the cyanamide process or any other process, but particularly by the cyanamide process. We have, down at Muscle Shoals, nitrate plant No. 2. It can get nitrogen from the atmosphere for the purpose of producing explosives in its present state, and it can get 40,000 tons of it a year, but it is not in a form to make fertilizer. There is a place in securing the nitrogen from the air by the cyanamide process, whether we are going to utilize it for fertilizer or for explosives, where the methods diverge. We have no machinery at nitrate plant No. 2 to utilize the nitrates in a form to be used as a fertilizer, and everybody concedes that it will cost several million dollars to put in the necessary machinery there to use the nitrogen for a fertilizer proposition. Most people forget that fact when they are talking about getting fertilizer out of nitrate plant No. 2. We have still an investment to make there. I have tried to find out just how much it would be. I have corresponded with some of the experts, and none of them agree. They all agree that it would cost something, a few million dollars. I have asked one chemist, in whose word I have the greatest confidence and who has no possible interest in the matter except the interest of his country, who says that in his judgment it will cost as much to put nitrate plant No. 2 in such condition that we can use the 40,000 tons of nitrates to make fertilizer as it would cost to build an entirely new plant to make it by the synthetic process and to make the same amount of it in a year.

No one wants to destroy nitrate plant No. 2 until we have replaced it with some method equally as good or better, that will get the same amount of nitrogen from the atmosphere that that plant will produce, because if war broke out to-morrow we would start that machinery going the next day to make explosives. But the time has about come, as I am informed by chemists, when we could well afford, as one chemist said, to build a new plant to get as much nitrogen out of the atmosphere as that plant would produce. We can build a plant of equal capacity for what it would cost to add the necessary machinery to nitrate plant No. 2 to make fertilizer. If we have not reached that point now, we soon will reach it.

So we have proposed no disposition of nitrate plant No. 2 in the joint resolution. I think it ought to be held in a stand-by condition to avoid any possibility that we would find ourselves at war without the necessity of getting the nitrogen from the air.

But I would like to say that private parties, the plant at Hopewell when it is completed, the plant at Charleston now, a plant at Syracuse, N. Y., and several other plants that did not exist at the time we went into the war, would produce more nitrogen than we can get at nitrate plant No. 2 in case that was destroyed and we went to war without it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wish to suggest that it is a quarter after five and to ask the Senator if he would be willing to suspend as it is desired to have an executive session?

Mr. NORRIS. I told the Senator from Kansas that just as soon as I made this brief statement I would be willing to suspend. However, I do not want to lose the floor because I have not finished.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not trying to take the Senator from the floor at all. I thought perhaps he would prefer to yield now and go on to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall try to finish to-morrow what I have to say.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator has no objection to my offering my amendment to the joint resolution and let it be pending?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend sections 2, 3, and 4 so that they will read as follows:

SEC. 2. In order to secure equitable distribution of Muscle Shoals power, according to the policies herein set forth, the Secretary of War is hereby empowered and authorized to lease the said power plants or to sell at the switchboard the current generated at said steam plant and said dam to municipalities and corporations authorized by law to distribute and sell electric current for general public use under public regulations; and to carry out said authority the Secretary of War is authorized to enter into contracts for such lease or sale for a term not exceeding 15 years from the 1st day of January, 1929: Provided, That no municipality shall receive a greater amount of power than upon the principle of equitable distribution that it is entitled to receive.

SEC. 3. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government and the Secretary of War is authorized to dispose of the current generated at Muscle Shoals for public use, except as provided in section 8 herein, subject to regulation provided by the laws of said States, and without unfair discrimination between municipalities or as to rates or service between users of such current.

SEC. 4. In order to place the Secretary of War upon a fair basis for making such contracts and for receiving bids for the sale of such current, if in his opinion it is necessary therefor, he is hereby expressly authorized, either from appropriations made by Congress or from funds secured from the sale of such current, to construct, lease, or authorize the construction of transmission lines for the sale and distribution of current within transmission distance in any direction from said Dam No. 2 and said steam plant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi. Is that the same amendment a copy of which the Senator gave to me yesterday?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a copy, with only immaterial changes, one being an extension of the term of the lease from 10 to 15 years.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I understood that the amendment was to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is the pending question.

COLONEL LINDBERGH—POEM BY HORACE C. CARLISLE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the brilliant poet of Washington, Mr. Horace C. Carlisle, has just written a magnificent poem on Colonel Lindbergh, in which he calls him "The citizen at large of all the world." I ask unanimous consent to have this splendid poetic tribute to Colonel Lindbergh printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINDBERGH

By Horace C. Carlisle

Above the boiling billows of the deep,
Through long unmeasured miles of lonesome air,
With one courageous, daring, danger sweep,
Beyond the reach of rest, relief, or sleep,
Lindbergh, afraid to fear, defied despair—
And from New York to Paris led the way
To favor, fame, and fortune in a day—
And won the heart of Europe, centered there.

With laurels placed by presidents and kings
Of European nations on his brow,
The unassuming Lindbergh deftly swings,
Himself into his plane of silver wings,
And preaches peace and good will from its prow—
And, then, across the ocean's frowning foam,
Sets sail for old America, and home,
As, smiling still, he makes his final bow.

America, with open heart and arms,
Enraptured, hugs her hero to her breast,
While, everywhere, in countless human swarms,
Moved by the merit of his grace and charms,
The worship of his name is manifest.
Supremely proud of this great feat of his—
But prouder still of what her Lindbergh is—
A nation welcomes him back home to rest.

Unmindful of the rest that he deserves,
Filled with the spirit of St. Louis still,
He plans a course from which he never swerves—
To satisfy anew his tenseless nerves;
To seek, at home, a greater, grander thrill—
To fly alone to every sovereign State,
And, proudly, in each of the forty-eight,
Declare to these his message of good will.

Then, cross the border line, to Mexico,
The Spirit of St. Louis wings its flight
Above where mountains range and rivers flow
Far, far aloft, where purer breezes blow,
To lend diviner charm to day and night;
And, with the hero of the higher air,
Amid a world of welcome, landing there,
Presents him, smiling, as the twain alight.

The peace and good-will gospel from his mouth
Finds lodgment in the heart of Mexico,
And in the war-worn nation farther south,
And in the torrid lands, immune to drouth,
In far-off South America below,
This pioneer of over-ocean skies
Through aviation's progress prophesies
Good will and peace alike to friend and foe.

Then, turning homeward o'er the torrid seas,
The Spirit of St Louis takes the air,
And, swifter than an arrow through the breeze
It flies until it sights the West Indies;
And stops to tour the islands clustered there—
While Lindbergh gets and gives another thrill
Through his immortal message of good will,
And paves the way toward interracial ease.

With all the honor Cubans could bestow
Upon the wonder hero of the skies,
Whose adoration of him seems to grow
As time draws near for him to rise and go—
To bid farewell to their heartfelt good-byes—
He smiles, as usual—hops into—alone—
The Spirit of St. Louis—and is gone—
To land not till St. Louis greets his eyes.

A chieftain child, at home in earth and sky,
Born underneath the Stars and Stripes unfurled,
Ideal, supreme, of all that walk or fly—
In whose deportment grace and glory lie—
At whom in vain vile envy's darts are hurled—
Lindbergh, throughout all countries, widely known,
Uniquely stands—remarkably alone—
The citizen at large of all the world.

Unselfish as the sun that shines to-day
Upon mankind through ninety million miles,
Immune to fear, unfettered by dismay,
In God's own care—alone—he wends his way
Above the changing clouds' enchanted aisles,
And, hero of the air, o'er land and sea—
Meek as a lamb, bold as a lion—he
His peace and good will preaches through his smiles.

Endowed with skill learned in experience school,
Above the earth, in God's great solitude,
Like Him, the Author of the golden rule,
Immortal Lindbergh, erstwhile "flying fool,"
Too, goes about, divinely doing good,
As, with the gift of healing in its wings—
He, in the Spirit of St. Louis, brings
The Master's golden rule to humanhood.

Back in his infancy, or early youth,
God must have hitched his wagon to a star,
And led him on—as Naomi led Ruth—
In wisdom's higher ways of deeper truth,
On up to where his inner secrets are—
Up, up, and up, and yet the higher still—
To be His great apostle of good will,
To arm the world for peace instead of war.

THE FLATHEAD POWER-SITE LEASE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on Tuesday, February 21, during a discussion of the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] directed my attention to a statement made by Mr. John Collier that—

> The money stake of the Indians in the Flathead power-site lease * * * is $228,000 a year for 50 years.

At that time I had not the advantage of having before me a statement upon which that conclusion was based. In justice to Mr. Collier, therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the calculations upon which that statement was made.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Both bids for these power sites are indefensibly low, and the Montana Power Co., by offering to surrender 15,000 horsepower at 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour, is seeking to obtain the lease at an unreasonably low rental. The competing bidder, while bidding more than the Montana Power Co., likewise is bidding unreasonably low.

The Indian tribe, according to the Federal power act and the regulations of the Federal Power Commission, is entitled to compensation for their power sites "for the most profitable purpose for which used, including power development."

This means that the tribe is entitled to a rental equal to the commercial value of the raw (undeveloped) power.

It must be assumed that the Federal Power Commission, if set free from any commitments, express or tacit, growing out of the "tentative agreement" of February 17, 1927, and if left free from any implied legislative direction to accept the Montana Power Co.'s present bid, or otherwise to require the delivery of power at cost—under such conditions it must be assumed that the Federal Power Commission would apply the terms of the law and regulations and would fix a rental equal or nearly equal to the commercial value of the raw power.

That rental would be considerably larger than $1 or $1.12 per horsepower per year.

THE RENTAL SHOULD BE THREE TIMES LARGER

Here, as in all the preceding statements, we are not in the field of theory; any layman can corroborate or criticize the following computations.

The value of raw water power is not an absolute figure, because the total investment necessary for its development, and other factors as well, vary with time, place, and circumstance. In the case of the Flathead power site the total necessary investment is not officially known with exactness, and the production cost will vary according to the amount of developed horsepower.

But the following is categorically known:

The upward limit of the commercial value of raw power at a power site is determined by cost of steam-plant production in the neighborhood plus the additional transmission costs, if any, entailed in the hydrodevelopment. In other words, the upward limit of the commercial value of raw power is from 3½ to 5 mills per kilowatt-hour. That is the maximum commercial rental which can reasonably, practically be fixed for a power site which it is desired to lease immediately.

And now what does $1 per horsepower per year represent in kilowatt-hour rental? It represents 0.304 per cent of 1 mill—three-tenths of 1 mill per kilowatt-hour. In other words, $1 per horsepower per year, assuming a 50 per cent load factor, is between one-tenth and one-fifteenth of the maximum reasonable and practicable commercial rental which could be demanded and obtained.

We do not assume that the Federal Power Commission will demand that maximum reasonable rental which a private owner of a power site would stand out for and would get. Theoretically, it may be the duty of the Federal Power Commission so to proceed, for it is made the guardian over a trust property by the terms of the Federal power act. But the pressure for early leasing is great, and it is a fact that other power sites exist in Montana, some of them on public domain, not so large nor so feasible as the Flathead power site, yet obtainable for that lower rental which the law permits where public domain power sites are being leased.

But it is entirely safe to assert that the Federal Power Commission could and should fix a minimum rental for the Flathead sites, amounting to at least one-third of that minimum rental which is theoretically proper. In other words, the minimum rental for the Flathead sites ought to be not less than 1 mill per kilowatt-hour for the developed power or three and one-third times larger than is proposed by the Montana Power Co.—nearly three and one-third times larger than is proposed by the competing bidder.

THE INCREASED RENTAL WOULD NOT INFLUENCE RATES

Would such an increased rental demand influence the sales prices of electric power? Here again the layman can answer almost as well as the expert. The sales prices of electric power in Montana run from the lowest wholesale rates of about 6 mills to the retail rates of 3, 4, and 5 cents, or 30, 40, and 50 mills. The increased rental here discussed, which is approximately two-thirds of 1 mill, represents about one-ninth of the sales price of power when wholesaled in largest blocks to the mines and railroads of Montana; about one-sixtieth of the cost of power retailed in that State. The difference is so slight that it could scarcely be reflected into the lowest wholesale rate; it certainly could not be reflected into the retail rates. The issue, therefore, has to do with the Indians and the lessee—more revenue to the Indians versus a little less of cheap production to the lessee.

And what does the difference amount to quantitatively?

What are the Indians fighting to get—to get rightfully under the terms of the law? What is the Montana Power Co. fighting to get?

The difference between 0.304 mill rental per kilowatt-hour and 1 mill rental per kilowatt-hour is seven-tenths mill per kilowatt-hour. Translated into a yearly rental per horsepower unit, the difference is as follows: One mill per kilowatt-hour is 3.28 larger, or $3.28 per horsepower unit per year. The rental which the Flatheads are to lose by the terms of the Montana Power Co. proposal is, therefore, $228,000 a year on the basis of a 100,000 horsepower development; and by the terms of the competing bid the amount which the tribe would lose would be $216,000 a year.

IT WILL NOW BE CLEAR WHY THE MONTANA POWER CO. HAS MADE ITS CURIOUS PROPOSAL

Obviously, other things being equal, the Montana Power Co. would not want to deliver 15,000 horsepower at less than cost, to be distributed over a distribution system paid for by the Government, in competition with the wholesale and retail market of the Montana Power Co.

* * * * * * *

The Montana Power Co. is naturally willing to sacrifice the 15,000 horsepower (taking it out of the small rental which it is offering the Indians) and to risk a competing Government distribution scheme, whose collapse through inefficiency it would expect, if by this means it can obtain one of the largest power sites on the continent for a very low rental—a rental so low that it represents a saving to the company of at least $228,000 a year. With the above facts understood, the strenuous effort by the Montana Power Co. to set in motion a Government competition with itself in the power-distributing field, becomes at once understandable. The comparatively low bid of the competing bidder is, of course, predicated on the low bid of the Montana Power Co.

And the loss to the Indians appears as a huge one, $228,000 a year of lost rentals is $11,400,000 over the 50-year period of the lease, on the basis of a 100,000 horsepower development.

It is $22,800,000 on the basis of a 200,000 horsepower development, and it its this larger development which probably will represent the average development over the 50-year period of the lease. That is the stake in the present struggle over the Flathead power sites. * * *

SEA SERVICE BUREAU OF SHIPPING BOARD

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of February 22, concerning the sea service bureau maintained by the Shipping Board.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BUREAU THAT MAKES LAW

The Senate has attached an amendment to the appropriation for the Shipping Board to the effect that none of the appropriation shall be used to maintain the sea service bureau. The bureau is now nothing but an employment office, performing services which by law are assigned to the shipping commissioners, for whom offices are provided in every port of entry that is also a port of ocean navigation.

The first duty of the shipping commissioner's office is "to afford facilities for engaging seamen by keeping a register of their names and characters." This is exactly the work that the sea service bureau is doing at an expense of about $150,000 a year. This is an inexcusable waste of public money. If the shipping commissioners have not done this duty they should do it, as required by law.

The shipping commissioners have an added duty of seeing that the laws relating to seamen are obeyed. There are certain laws for the protection of the seamen which would be obeyed if this work was done by the shipping commissioners. Among these laws are certain penalties for misconduct when committed by the seamen or when committed by the officers of the vessel. The sea service bureau disregards these laws and places men on what is called the deferred list (black list), in lieu of submitting those men to the regular authorities for trial and punishment. These laws were passed to protect life and property at sea by maintaining proper skill and discipline. To disregard those laws and substitute therefor the whim of the owner, the master, and the sea service bureau must necessarily result in fostering a disregard for law and in driving skilled and law-abiding seamen from the service.

By its own admission the sea service bureau uses the deferred list in lieu of the penalties not only for serious infractions of discipline, but even for crimes. This is a vicious system of lawmaking by a bureau, in disregard of the laws of Congress. The bureau should be abolished. The House conferees should accept the Senate amendment to the Shipping Board bill.

LIMITATION OF INJUNCTIONS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of February 20, concerning the so-called Shipstead bill relating to injunctions.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARE WE TIED IN A KNOT?

A. P. Thom, counsel for the Association of Railway Executives, tells the Senate Judiciary Committee that the Shipstead bill to limit the use of the injunction would be declared unconstitutional. He may be right, but does he think that would settle the question? Mr. Thom further argues that Congress set up a system of Federal courts and can not now change it. That sounds pretty foolish, at least as an argument for not doing things Mr. Thom and his executives don't want done to the injunction. It sounds foolish because it amounts to telling people that they have been tied up in a knot and are now powerless to rescue themselves.

The Constitution has done so well in the things which the fathers foresaw and has submitted itself so well to stretching to cover what they could not foresee, that we tend to suspect an argument that it prescribes courses which would seem to the men who wrote it unjust. However, we all know that the Constitution is invoked now and again to shelter practices revolting to the moral sense of our times. If Mr. Thom is right and the Constitution really prevents Congress doing anything about the abuse of injunction that has grown up in our day, he is really arguing for amendment to the Constitution. And in the end, if necessary, he and his executives will get it.

We like to believe the framers were wise enough to avoid tyranny. We know they did not intend that we should have government by Federal courts through the use of injunctions. We know they were wise enough to foresee that some amendment of their work would be necessary. Sound advice to great employers of labor to-day, and especially to railroad managements and mine managements, is to cooperate with Congress in limiting the excesses of which they have been guilty in recent years.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE NEAR NEW MARTINSVILLE, W. VA.

Mr. NEELY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2801) granting the consent of Congress to the New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.) to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River. The bill is in regular form, and to it there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 1, page 1, line 8, after the name "West Virginia," to strike out "to a point at or near Duffy, Monroe County, Ohio," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near New Martinsville, Wetzel County, W. Va., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches and terminals as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation and expropriation of property in such State.

SEC. 3. That the said New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of West Virginia, the State of Ohio, any political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interest in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over or acquired by the States or political subdivisions thereof as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, to pay an adequate return on the cost thereof, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of acquiring the bridge and its approaches shall have been provided such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper care, repair, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for operating, repairing, and maintaining the same, and the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The said New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate the actual cost of constructing the same, and for such purpose the said New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the financing and the construction thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the actual original cost of the bridge shall be conclusive, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the New Martinsville & Ohio River Bridge Co. (Inc.) to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near New Martinsville, W. Va."

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 24, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 23, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, we thank Thee for the infinite revelation of Thy wisdom. So intensify our motives that our aim shall be to express the lofty in that which seems to be small and trivial. Draw us so near to Thee that principle, affirmation, and a prevailing sense of duty may be the sustained attractiveness of our characters. Put into our souls the love of the pure and in our lips the law of kindliness. Oh, lead us on to do the right. Do the right, for finally it will be acknowledged everywhere; do the right, for some day it will bring up all arrears; do the right, for it will eventually stand forth in the white light that must forever beat against the Father's throne; do the right, for in the ages to come it shall be crowned with fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore. The Lord God help us. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 9280. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.

H. J. Res. 156. House joint resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the British Government to appoint delegates to the Eighth International Dairy Congress to be held in Great Britain during June-July, 1928, and providing for an appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the expenses of the delegates.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The Speaker announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1154. An act to authorize the use by the county of Yuma, Ariz., of certain public lands for a municipal aviation field, and for other purposes; and

S. 1959. An act to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction over oil and gas leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior on lands in naval petroleum reserves.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1759) entitled "An act to appropriate treaty funds due the Wisconsin Pottawatomi Indians."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 5501. An act authorizing the Hermann Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Hermann, Gasconade County, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following bill, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1104. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River at or near Garland City, Ark.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10635) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. MOSES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HARRIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some remarks of my own delivered yesterday upon the anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following address on George Washington, delivered by me before the Association of Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia on Washington's Birthday:

Mr. Chairman Noyes, ladies, and gentlemen, I acknowledge with grateful thanks the privilege of taking part in a Washington Birthday celebration with the Association of Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia.

I consider it indeed a privilege. Nay, more, I feel it is an adornment, a decoration, to receive such a recognition from so distinguished, so high-minded, and so useful an organization.

I am proud to be your guest and speaker, not only because you are distinguished, but because you do a noble deed. You are helping to create interest in things that concern us all, and popular interest in public affairs is the foundation of our civilization and the safeguard of the liberties of every American that lives. If ever the liberties of our land go tottering to their fall, it will be because of an ignoble thing—indifference to public things. Whatever o'ercomes indifference is thus noble. And therefore you are entitled to thanks. And so, if I were President of the United States and could be here, I would thank you here and now. Would tender to you the thanks of the Republic because you thus promote patriotism.

Oliver Wendell Holmes sings:

Welcome to the day returning,
Dearer still as ages flow,
While the torch of faith is burning
Long as freedom's altars glow.
See the hero whom it gave us,
Slumbering on a mother's breast,
For the arm he stretched to save us
Be its morn forever blest!

Hezekiah Butterworth sings:

Arise, 'tis the day of our Washington's glory;
The garlands uplift for our liberties won.
Oh sing in your gladness his echoing story,
Whose sword swept for freedom the fields of the sun!

Not with gold nor with gems
But with evergreens vernal,
And the banners of the stars that the continent span,
Crown, crown we the chief of the heroes eternal,
Who lifted his sword for the birthright of man.

Lord Byron sings:

Where may the wearied eyes repose
When gazing on the great
Where neither guilty glory glows
Nor despicable state?
Yes; one (the first, the last; the best,
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,)
Bequeathed the name of Washington
To make men blush there was but one.

THE REVOLUTION, O AMERICANS! THE DAYS OF 1776!

A historic darkness follows a historic day.

British force has undertaken to coerce the high-minded and valorous tillers of Massachusetts soil.

They are steady, sturdy, simple souls, these Massachusetts Minutemen; but they are startled into high resolve, they are inspired by a magnificent indignation, they are roused into a grand temerity. It is patience shocked into impatience; it is peace turned into war.

Noble men of 1776. Momentous impulse; memorable results.

The people hasten to the hustings; the burgesses rally at the council houses.

John Adams, John Hancock, James Otis, Patrick Henry, all gild brilliantly the page of history.

Congress after Congress; Congress observing a fast day; Congress at prayer; Congress listening to Richard Lee urge his immortal resolution:

"These Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States."

And now the bell is ringing on Independence Hall, the cannon roar in New England, and the Carolinas are all ablaze with bonfires.

"All men are created free and equal."

"Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the inalienable rights of every man."

Every community stirred to its foundations in the mighty crisis.

Noble men of 1776! They all stand in deadly peril.

Ben Franklin finds "his philosophy too cold for the South and his jokes too warm for the North," but he jokes just the same, saying "We must assuredly all hang together, or we shall assuredly all hang separately!"

Battle after battle, Bunker Hill, Long Island, Brandywine, Valley Forge, Trenton, Princeton, Eutaw Springs, General Lincoln surrendering his sword to Cornwallis at Charleston (even as in later days the sword of Cornwallis was handed to General Lincoln), then Saratoga! And, finally, Yorktown!

Permit me to read here page 115 of Weem's Washington:

"On hearing in Congress the fall of Cornwallis the Doorkeeper swooned with joy—on hearing the same news in Parliament Lord North fell back in his chair in distress. The stern features of war relaxed but Washington beheld the sight with doubt—

"Great Britain—if she 'play quits,' it must be the work of that Providence who ruleth in the armies of heaven and earth and whose hand has been visibly displayed in every step of our progress to independence."

FRANCE

Meanwhile, Franklin in Paris. Lafayette to the rescue, Rochambeau and Count D'Estaing to the rescue. Old Baron Steuben and old DeKalb and De Grasse to the rescue. Kosciusko to the rescue. Freedom's friends all to the rescue!

Oh, let the breezes bear every bud and blossom, aster and nasturtium, camellia and lobelia, pansy and honeysuckle, and all their fragrant sisterhood, away, to-day, to the grave of Lafayette and Kosciusko and DeKalb, and all those who gave us help, in that dark young day, when help was dear.

And let us break open the baskets and pour forth the blossoms, and make to bloom like the rose the resting places of the hundreds and thousands of the martyrs of that time.

They could have had only the mistiest conception of this stupendous Nation of to-day; yet they fought as if for a world.

Over the 300 wild horsemen whom Francis Marion led, and whom Major Tarleton could not whip or catch, we could make a pile of flowers, all afire with the flame which lighted their dauntless hearts.

Deck the spot which is the last resting place of Ethan Allen, who so angered the British by his famous battle cry, "The Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress," and forget not the youngsters who followed him and were known as "the Green Mountain boys."

And give bluebells and other blooms to place above the three militiamen whom Major Andre and Benedict Arnold's gold could not corrupt nor bribe.

And jasmine for Molly Pitcher, who fired the old brass cannon after her husband, the gunner, was cut down on the fateful field of Monmouth.

THE COLONIAL MAID

And, oh, begonia, and petunia, and hyacinth, and fuschia, and lily, and rose for all those colonial maids and matrons, heroines every one, who, in every part of the distressed land, from the ocean to the mountains, from Quebec to Kentucky, charming maids and matrons, cheered on and on the "ragged continentals," in their buckskin clothing and their coonskin caps, and caused them to endure and ever still more to endure. O lovely lovers of liberty, ye shall not be forgot!

The widow Mott, hastening the conflagration of her own home rather than have it fall into foemen's hands; Margaret Corbin, the Joan of Arc, herself wounded in action! Abigail Adams, Deborah Sampson, Martha Washington, Molly Starks, Betsy Ross—what a glorious roll!

"Nor shall your glory be forgot,
While fame her record keeps
And honor guards the hallowed spot
Where valor proudly sleeps."

Their sacrifices were sublime, their privations were pitiful, their aid more precious than rubies!

FLAG

And let us of this generation fail not to remember that but for that winning fight by all these men and women the flag we love to-day would never have been conceived.

"Resolved," said Congress, "Resolved, That the flag of the United States shall be 13 stripes, alternate red and white, with 13 stars on a blue field, representing a new constellation."

Could there have been in the mind or soul of man or woman a more beautiful conception? "A new constellation?" As a matter of fact, did this inspiring, poetic, celestial idea come from the brain of any mere man? I do not think it did; I think it come from Betsy Ross.

All hail to thee, thou grand old flag
Still floating o'er the free,
Though soiled and torn by foemen hands
Thou'rt doubly dear to me.

When, in my boyhood early days
I saw thee first unfurled,
I deemed thee then the pride of earth,
The glory of the world.

And when in later years I stood
In busy haunts of men,
And saw thee float o'er field and flood,
Old flag, I loved thee then.

But now, when neath thy glorious folds
No slave need cringe nor bow,
My father's and my country's flag,
I love thee better now.

Float on, old flag, until thy stripes
Shall all the nations heal,
And tyranny throughout the earth
Shall thy just vengeance feel.

"FIRST IN WAR"

The panorama discloses in every section, as a matter, of course, George Washington. There are few tableaux in which he fails to occupy the center of the scene.

In 1775 we see him draw the sword of command under the old elm at Cambridge.

Glorious sword; sacred blade!

Sword never to be sheathed, although dangers multiply; although disasters develop; although defeats and retreats dishearten, until British cannon cease to bellow and British bluster is heard no longer.

"FIRST IN PEACE"

In 1789 we see him standing on the balcony, at New York, taking the oath—the words of that tremendous obligation trembling on his lips as they went upward to be registered in heaven.

How clean and pure he kept both sword and oath!

I call, as witnesses, William McKinley, President; John Marshall, Chief Justice; Daniel Webster, Senator (orator, February 22, 1832, the one hundredth birthday); Major General (Marquis) Lafayette; Lieut. Col. (Congressman) Henry Lee (chosen to deliver the address before Congress on the day set apart, December 26, 1799); Abraham Lincoln.

SEVEN TRIBUTES TO WASHINGTON

President William McKinley, 1899:

"To-day, nearly a century from Washington's death, we turn reverentially to study the leading principles of that comprehensive chart for the guidance of the people.

"It was his unflinching devotion to these perceptions of duty which more than anything else made him what he was, and contributed so directly to make us what we are.

"Following the precepts of Washington we can not err.

"The wise lessons in government which he left us it will be profitable to heed.

"He seems to have grasped all possible conditions and pointed the way safely to meet them.

"He has established danger signals all along the pathway of the Nation's march.

"His wisdom and foresight have been confirmed and vindicated after more than a century of experience."

John Marshall, in the Life of George Washington, says (p. 122, ch. 6), in connection with that depressing experience, the retreat of Washington's army through Jersey:

"Among the many valuable traits in the character of Washington was the unyielding firmness of mind, which resisted these accumulated circumstances of depression, and supported him under them.

"Undismayed by the dangers which surrounded him, he did not for an instant relax his exertions."

Webster on Washington's conduct of America's foreign relations:

"The maxims upon which Washington conducted our foreign relations were few and simple. The first was an entire and indisputable impartiality toward foreign states.

"The famous phrase, 'Honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none,' was not Washington's, but Jefferson's. But his words were fully as forceful; they show his deep fear that foreign influence would insinuate itself into our councils through the channels of domestic dissensions and obtain a sympathy with our own temporary parties.

"With a tone of earnestness nowhere else found, even in his last affectionate farewell advice, he says:

"'Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.'"

Lieut. Col. (Congressman) Henry Lee, December 26, 1799:

"The founder of our Federate Republic—our bulwark in war, our guide in peace, is no more! First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and enduring scenes of private life.

"Methinks I see his august image and hear falling from his venerable lips these deep-sinking words:

"'Cease, sons of America, lamenting our separation; go on and confirm by your wisdom the fruits of our joint councils, joint efforts, and common dangers.

"'Reverence religion; diffuse knowledge throughout your land; patronize the arts and sciences; let liberty and order be inseparable companions; control party spirit, the bane of free government; observe good faith to and cultivate peace with all nations; shut up every avenue of foreign influence; contract rather than extend national connection; rely on yourselves only; be American in thought and deed!

"'Thus will you give immortality to that Union which was the constant object of my labors.'"

General (Marquis) Lafayette wrote to Chief Justice John Marshall a letter about the Battle of Monmouth, and in this letter said:

"Never was General Washington greater in war than in this action. His presence stopped the retreat. His disposition fixed the victory. His fine appearance on horseback, his calm courage, roused by the animation produced by the vexation of the morning, gave him the air best calculated to excite enthusiasm."

Abraham Lincoln's tribute:

"Washington's is the mightiest name of earth—long since the mightiest in the cause of civil liberty; still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

Washington not a demigod.

This outburst, by Lincoln, seems to me to cap the climax. It seems to be the very sublimity of hyperbole—something quite beyond description or realization. After this flight of impassioned, impressive eloquence, it would seem that no soaring, no words of human utterance, could higher soar. Of course, I shall not attempt it.

The condition or situation would seem to be well set forth in the book entitled "Sally Cary: a Long-Hidden Romance of Washington's Life" (by Wilson Miles Cary, published in 1896), in these words:

"The microscope of history has been diligently leveled for the past century upon the character and personality of Washington. His fame, great as it was in his life, has been steadily expanding with the Republic, till now the Father of His Country has fairly burst the bonds of human nature and assumed the proportions of a demigod. His epistles throw a side light and help to save him from that colorless dehumanization to which too indiscriminate eulogy was fast reducing our grandest American. * * * They show steady control of strong impulses which pygmies never feel."

FIVE ASPECTS OF WASHINGTON

Finding myself unable to cope with these other speakers and writers, some of whom knew Washington personally, and all of whom studied him minutely, I, after endeavoring to study them all as minutely as a busy life has permitted, have fully come to the conclusion that I am not qualified to attempt to discuss the whole life and character of our first President.

And so I shall not endeavor to go over his ability as a general and an executive, which more than a thousand writers have elaborately discussed.

But I will try to mention some of the things most dear to his heart and most notable in his action.

I. FRIEND OF EDUCATION

That he believed in and was in favor of education—in other words, the general diffusion of knowledge—is shown by the following quotation from his farewell address:

"It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shape the foundation of the fabric. In proportion as a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

"Promote, then, as an object of primary importance institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge."

A hundred other things bear testimony—for example, he maintained at college at his own expense nine of his own relatives; and we all know the unremitting enthusiasm with which he pushed his project for the Military Academy at West Point. He also found time to serve as chancellor of the William and Mary College and to urge the maintenance of a national university.

II. LABOR CHAMPION

That he believed in work and effort and thoroughness admits of no denial or debate. His theory is well set forth in a letter to a nephew, Bushrod Washington, reading as follows:

"Remember, that it is not the mere study of the law but to become eminent in the profession of it which is to yield honor and profit. The first (the law) was your choice, let the second (eminence) be your ambition; that the company in which you will improve most will be least expensive to you. And yet I am not such a stoic as to suppose that you will (or think it right that you should) always be in company with Senators and philosophers; but of the young and juvenile kind let me advise you to be choice. It is easy to make acquaintances, but very difficult to shake them off (however irksome and unprofitable they are found) afer we have once committed ourselves to them."

Would it not have been a priceless boon to all of us in this presence if some one had only in our early youth emphasized the fact that distinction in any profession comes only with the highest attainment and that not even profit comes without such attainment? After bitter experience, we all know that there is no real success without intense application; and that he who is content to be a mere student instead of a master will not only be without honor but also without profit.

"The heights by great men scaled and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward through the night."

WASHINGTON, MODEL PUBLIC SERVANT

Believing in work—w-o-r-k—as he did, our Washington never turned down a chance, never neglected an opportunity, never turned a deaf ear, never was blind to an appeal to lend his presence and approval to a church or charity, a deserving fraternity or lodge, or a worthy association of either men or women, whether conspicuous or humble. He never despised public office. He was not a shrinking patriot. He did not bury himself in some solemn chamber of reflection, some old law office or courthouse. He did not hide therein to wait for the hour when the public ear should become attuned to his words. On the contrary, all his efforts were such as to fasten the public eye upon him and cause him to be searched out among his fellows. He was one of that brilliant company, the surveyors of his day, a hard worker on vast estates, penetrating savage wildernesses while yet a minor. (Let us not forget the challenging fact that not only Washington but Thomas Marshall, of the third Virginia line, and later Abraham Lincoln and later a host of our celebrities, were once surveyors.) He was a member of the house of burgesses before the French and Indian War, was a major and assistant adjutant general before he was a lieutenant colonel in the days of General Braddock, and the latter's ill-fated "expedition" and ambush. He was a delegate to the Continental Congress until 1775, when elected commanding general, and was "president and deputy from Virginia" in the Constitutional Convention beginning 1787. And he found time to be warden in his church, master in his lodge, and chancellor of a college.

III. RELIGION

That he was a believer in Divine Providence is shown by the following extract:

"Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports.

"In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens.

"The mere politician equally with the pious man ought to respect and to cherish them.

"A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity.

"Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice?

"And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion.

"Whatever may be conceded (to the influence of refined education), reason and experience forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles."

It is in recognition of Washington's belief in God that the likeness of him in imperishable bronze which hangs on the wall of the old Subtreasury in old New York represents him on his knees in the snow at Valley Forge on that mighty day when he made his most urgent appeal to Heaven.

O Valley Forge! Have you been to Valley Forge? If not, hasten, I beg you, to go at your earliest opportunity.

See the breastworks; the line where Lafayette's division lay; the line of Mad Anthony Wayne; the great arch of marble with its lettering—

"They shall hunger no more;
Neither thirst any more."

And, above all, see the bronze praying stool and on it the words: "Day of fasting and prayer, June 1, 1774. I went to church and fasted all day." A reproduction in the handwriting of George Washington.

IV. THE LOVER

I remark, in the fourth place, that there really was a Washington who was not a demigod, or any kind of a god, but a very, very human, terrestrial being. It rejoices my heart to be able to truthfully say this—rejoices my heart that there was a talking, walking, living, loving Washington. It would not help me to know that he was a demigod, unearthly, far apart. It could do me no good to be exhorted to imitate a demigod, because I could not so do, by any possibility. But there is the very liveliest incentive and the most potent inducement for me to try to be like him in my little humble obscure individuality, when I learn that he was just flesh and blood and mortal man, like you and me, tempted at all points like as we are.

I cite you to two examples of his humanness, his earthly, undivine—or rather nongodly make-up.

See him riding up to the town of Monmouth in the early dawn. His ragged army has just been revived (somewhat) by the spring following the winter at Valley Forge.

In three divisions it is marching upon Monmouth. The hour has come to turn and fight. (To every man and nation comes the hour when he or it must turn and fight or die. That hour has come to him.) He advances full of hope, eye alight, head erect, soul aloft. All of a sudden he meets one of his most able and conspicuous generals, Charles Lee, in full retreat, when he ought to be in full advance. Washington spurs his horse up to that of Lee until the stirrups clash, and says, "You are a —— poltroon!"

Would you have had it otherwise? Would you have had that cowardly or calculating commander (trusted by our Washington in the hour of our peril) escape his deserved rebuke? God forgive me, but I am glad that he used the good, the short, the ugly word. In that one moment we had revealed to us and to history the fact that underneath was a soul of tempestuous, tumultuous passion, always hitherto controlled by the man and mastered by him. Deep emotion was also exhibited the day the treason of Benedict Arnold was discovered and the day the militiamen retreated at Kips Ferry—the day he tried to beat the line forward with the flat of his sword—and the day Major André was executed.

And see him offering his hand to five different girls—five different girls in 10 years, pressing his suit—

At 16 to Mary Carey, of Fairfax.

At 18 to Mary Brand, of Westmoreland.

At 20 to Mary Fauntleroy, of Richmond.

At 22 to Mary Phillipse, of New York.

At 26 to Martha Custis, whom he married in his twenty-seventh year. Are you not glad? I am! It makes him seem less remote; more like us! I rejoice that all the men of valor who have kept the flag in the sky have been ardent lovers of American women—all of them. When they fought, they fought violently, and then fell violently in love.

V. WASHINGTON, THE OPTIMIST

I remark, in the fifth place, that George Washington was a real, an eternal optimist.

He had his disappointments, and, indeed, plenty of them, but he was not a pessimist.

He was hopeful always, in a cool, determined way; not flamboyant.

A pessimist has been defined as a man who, having to choose between two evils, takes no chances, but chooses both.

I know the breed; you know the brand; it is an ugly type.

Such a man continually goes about contending that everything is going from bad to worst, going to "the demnition bow wows." Such a man believes that "there were giants in those days," but not now.

He believes that there are no longer anywhere, on land or sea, any good preachers, any good teachers, any good doctors, any good lawyers, any good capitalists, any good laborers, any good editors. He thinks they are all dead and gone.

And such a man is wrong.

As a matter of fact, there never were in any time or clime so many good preachers, so many good teachers, so many good doctors and lawyers and editors as there are to-day.

There never was so much generosity and benevolence and philanthropy and good samaritanism in general, never so much of the milk of human kindness in the hearts of men, never so much of the Lord God Almighty in humanity as there is to-day.

While it is a time for patience and forbearance and for withholding of judgment it is not a time for pessimism.

And while it is a time for discouraging the fanatic, who goes searching for liberty with a torch in one hand and a bomb in the other, it is not a time to be discouraged about the progress of liberty, not a time to gratify the kings and emperors and sultans and czars and mikados by giving the impression that the American experiment of self-government is (in any sense or to any degree) a failure. Make no mistake, no king or emperor or sultan or czar (or mikado) is lying awake at night praying for the success of this Republic; let us not please him by admitting that we have failed, for we have not failed, and we stand at this hour facing the noblest opportunity ever faced by free government.

Concerning "opportunity" a gifted orator once said:

"I knock but once,
And I return no more;
If sleeping, wake!"

This is a false doctrine.

Here is a better verse:

"They do me wrong,
Who say I come no more,
When once I knock and fail to find you in,
For every morn I knock at every door
And bid you wake and rise to fight and win."

Faith in God and in humanity and in freedom never deserted Washington.

Difficulties never made him afraid. Jefferson once said he was a stranger to fear.

The unalterable determination and dogged perseverance which fought on after Long Island fell; fought on after the abandonment of New York; fought on after the retreat through Jersey; fought on after the retreat from Philadelphia; fought on after the loss of Charleston, and the overrunning of the Carolinas; fought on, with Howe at Philadelphia and Clinton at New York, with Burgoyne coming down from Canada, and Cornwallis and Tarleton coming up from Carolina, despite Benedict Arnold ravaging New England, and the sinister presence of the Hessian—can you imagine optimism greater?

And then see him during that period from 1783 to 1789—long, tedious, weary years—talking, talking, writing, writing, urging, urging, that the Union under one government is the only salvation.

Oh, the faith; oh, the sublime faith in that glad and grand and glorious heart!

Faith in America, his country, and her people! Optimism, indeed!

That sacred flame on the Nation's altar never died down, because he kept it alive.

It burned and burned as our forefathers fell around about the campfires that cradled our liberties.

And it flamed right on, in Washington's soul, all through the ensuing six years, those anxious years 1783 to 1789, following the Revolution.

And then, when those six years went by, and 1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, 1794, 1795, and 1796 came—that is, seven more years came—still he stood there at the altar of the Nation tending the eternal flame, stood there a pillar of fire himself, between this infant Republic and all the powers and politics that imperilled it.

What if he had fallen, what if he had failed, had faltered? Where and what would we, the Americans, have been to-day?

The theories and principles that he harbored in his heart he reveals more fully than elsewhere in his farewell address to the American people, in 1796. I have already read to you what he said about education and about religion. I now must read a few things which show the absolute confidence in the ability of the American Republic to take care of itself.

"Let us erect a standard to which the wise and honest may repair. The rest is in the hands of God."

"Let us impart all the blessings we possess or ask for ourselves to the whole family of mankind."

"'Tis substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government."

"It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world."

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is to have with them as little political connection as possible."

"Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies."

Richard Watson Gilder sings:

Ye who defeated, 'whelmed,
Betray the sacred cause, let go the trust;
Sleep, weary, while the vessel drifts unhelmed;
Here, see, in triumph rise the hero from the dust!

All ye who fight forlorn
'Gainst fate and failure; ye who proudly cope
With evil high enthroned; all ye who scorn
Life from dishonor's hand, here take new heart of hope.

WASHINGTON—CRITICISM OF HIM IN HIS DAY

Thomas Wentworth Higginson says:

"On the last day of office a Philadelphia newspaper dismissed Washington with a final tirade, worth remembering by all who think that political virulence is on the increase:

"'Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation,' was the exclamation of a man who saw a flood of blessedness breaking in upon mankind. If ever there was a time that allowed this exclamation to be repeated, that time is the present. The man who is the source of all our country's misery is this day reduced to the rank of his fellow citizens and has no longer the power to multiply the woes of these United States. Now more than ever is the time to rejoice. Every heart which feels for the liberty and the happiness of the people must now beat with rapture at the thought that this day the name of Washington ceases to give currency to injustice and to legalize corruption. * * * When we look back upon the eight years of Washington's administration it strikes us with astonishment that one man could thus poison the principles of republicanism among our enlightened people and carry his designs against the public liberty so far as to endanger its very existence. Yet such is the fact, and if this is apparent to all, this day should form a jubilee in the United States."

My fellow citizens of the year 1928, when I came across this item and example of the criticism and abuse which Washington encountered in his day, I, of course, remembered, as most of us do in a sort of general way, that Washington was much criticized in his official lifetime by men and writers who disapproved his policies, and that he must have suffered much in his feelings, conscious as he was of the rectitude of his conduct and the purity of his motives. But I confess I was horrified at the malignity of this particular piece of abuse.

Is it any wonder, ladies and gentlemen, that on the last day in office, the same day as this attack, Washington wrote to General Knox comparing himself to "the weary traveler who sees a resting place and is bending his body to lean thereon," and is it any wonder that he added, "To be suffered to do this in peace is too much to be endured by some"?

CONCLUSION

My fellow citizens, Washington was, of course, much more than a great lover, great believer, great advocate of education and of religion and of federal union, and of individual industry. Soldier and general, legislator and executive, politican and diplomat, he was all these and more. He was a farmer and business man and promoter and explorer and many things more. But I consider his chief distinction is that he was the giver, to the world and humanity, of its chiefest example of free government. I think we ought here and now to highly resolve that he shall not have struggled in vain; highly resolve that we will not fail him (as he looks over the battlements of heaven to observe us); that we will do all that feeble finite hand and mind can do to make real that which was his ideal.

O men and women of America, I believe that this dear country of ours was divinely ordained. I believe that the curtain of waters of the Atlantic Ocean was held right down on the east side of this continent until the prow of Columbus parted these western waters in 1492 for a mighty purpose. And I believe that that mighty purpose was and is to establish—yea to maintain—here on this western continent a mighty and model Republic. I believe that it is part of that mighty purpose that this mighty Republic should be and become in truth and in fact the heir of the ages, the child of the centuries, the beacon light of liberty, the last hope of humanity, utterly regardless of what it costs—in men or in money, in brain or in bayonets, in treasure or in tears. Wise and just, brave and firm, our forefathers and our fathers have gone away for a while and have left in our hands the work of their hands. It is worth saving; it is worth serving. Let us do so right now in humble imitation of their august example—pledge to the mighty work of our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors.

"Thou, too, sail on, O ship of state."

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF CLARK AGAINST WHITE

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Elections No. 1, on the contested-election case of W. H. Clark against Hays B. White, from the sixth congressional district of the State of Kansas, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 122

Resolved, That W. H. Clark was not elected a Representative in this Congress from the sixth congressional district of the State of Kansas and is not entitled to a seat herein.

Resolved, That Hays B. White was duly elected a Representative from the sixth congressional district of the State of Kansas and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment or two on this case. The committee does feel, however, that we should take this occasion, and every appropriate occasion, to serve notice on the public generally, and the members of the bar particularly, that these cases are considered upon their merits and upon the law and that political expediency does not enter into our deliberations.

The committee feels also that we should take this occasion to say that the fees in this case are allowed as we believe a fair and impartial judge would allow such fees for the actual services rendered. In this case, particularly on one side, there appears to have been very little work done, and yet a claim was submitted for more than the entire amount authorized by Congress. The committee has not allowed the amount that was claimed. We went over the matter carefully and allowed what we believed was a fair compensation for the work which was done; in fact, I believe it is a generous allowance, and yet it is less than one-half of the amount that was claimed. We expect to follow the practice of allowing a reasonable fee only, and that for service actually rendered.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. Is this a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. COLTON. It is. The committee is unanimous in making its report and its finding in this case; and I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK], the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can say anything that would add to the statement of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON]. Simply the petition and the answer were filed in this case. Absolutely no proof was taken. The attorney for the contestant, W. H. Clark, came before the committee and frankly admitted that the contestant had lost his day in court.

The contestant did make some investigation over the district and had consultations with his attorneys, and for some unknown reason failed to prosecute the contest. Whatever the merits may have been, the committee heard nothing of the facts of the case.

We took up the question of fees and costs, as the chairman has said, just as an impartial judge would. This case was not viewed from the political standpoint, but in order that fairness might be done between the Government on the one hand and the contestant and the contestee on the other, both as to fees and expense account.

There was no difference of opinion between the individual members of the committee and after going over and carefully investigating the expense items and the labor performed by the attorneys, this report comes to the House as a unanimous report, both on the seating of Mr. WHITE and on the question of expenditures.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first part of the resolution.

The first part of the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the second part of the resolution.

The second part of the resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House compensation at the rate of $1,800 per annum, payable monthly, for the services of a temporary assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid

Pensions for the purpose of making the pending work of the committee current. Such employment shall terminate not later than November 1, 1928.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

OFFICE OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I present another resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until otherwise provided by law the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House annual compensation payable monthly as follows:

For the services of a clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, $2,880;

For the services of a janitor to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, $1,200.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the figures "1,200" in line 8 and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1,110."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

ERMA RUSSELL

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I present another resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Erma Russell, granddaughter of Aaron Russell, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to six months of his compensation and an additional amount not exceeding $250 to defray the funeral expenses of the said Aaron Russell.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the last resolution (H. Res. 104); I would like the privilege of extending my remarks. This employee was an employee of the House of Representatives for over 50 years, and I would like to make some remarks upon his service.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, Aaron Russell entered the service of this House as one of its employees on December 1, 1861, and with the exception of eight years, from 1911 to 1919, served continuously, a total service of 58 years. He died at the age of 87 years. It is testified by those who knew him that he was a man of splendid character and faithful in all things. Russell, upon a meager salary raised a large family and educated and fitted them for professional and other service. He was prominent in the work of his church, in which he was a devoted leader, and was active in civic affairs among colored people who esteemed him highly. During his long service here in the House he became well informed and his acquaintanceship embraced statesmen of the stirring days of the Civil War, of the reconstruction period, and of later years. Among his personal friends, who found in Russell a dependable and conscientious public servant, were Thaddeus Stevens, James G. Blaine, Thomas B. Reed, Samuel J. Randall, John G. Carlisle, Joseph G. Cannon, and many others. His particular friend and benefactor was the late Edward McPherson, prominent as a Member of the House and for many years Clerk of the House. In his office Aaron Russell was a clerk, having won successive promotions from his original position as a laborer. In the McPherson family, I am told, Russell was regarded with admiration and affection for his manly qualities.

To his children, Russell was a fine example of right living. They testify to his correct habits. For instance:

We never saw him in the house with his coat or collar off, or his hat on, and never knew him to smoke, whistle, or spit in the house. No matter how hard it might rain he always insisted that the boys black their shoes before going out. "You must start out right," was his rule.

From 1870 until his death Aaron Russell was a member of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church, in this city. The members of that congregation attended his funeral, and the pastor, the Rev. Halley B. Taylor, D. D., delivered the following address, which is worthy of insertion in the RECORD:

When Joseph had caused his father, Jacob, to be brought down into the land of Egypt during the days of the great famine, recorded in the Book of Genesis, he led him into the presence of the then-reigning Pharaoh in order that the father might meet the monarch in whose sight he had found so great favor, and that the monarch might behold the father whose offspring had saved from death both himself and his people.

While they thus confronted each other Pharaoh, manifesting a kindly interest in the old man before him, asked the friendly question, "How old art thou?" And the patriarch, mindful of the everlasting covenant made by the Almighty with Abraham, Isaac, and himself, made answer in these significant words, "The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years." Jacob, in thus replying, enunciated a hope that is easily understood by us, but the universal applicability of the truth inferred too often escapes our serious consideration because of the insistent character of the demands made upon us by the conditions of modern life.

In speaking of the days of his pilgrimage he acknowledged himself a pilgrim. For 130 years he had been journeying. Changing times and scenes and conditions had convinced him that here he had no permanent dwelling place. He saw himself a traveling stranger with no hope of perfect rest until he had at last entered the blessed confines of the Land of Promise.

We, like Jacob, should bear in mind that we, one and all, are but pilgrims. That we have here no continuing city and that each dawning day finds us still strangers, ever passing through the world, revealing our real spiritual worth to our fellow travelers by our responses to the things that touch our lives and by our constant endeavor to bring forth as realities the dreams that stir our souls.

Thought of, then, in the light of the foregoing facts, what manner of man was this our departed brother, Aaron Russell, whose still form before us proclaims the end of his pilgrimage?

Mr. Aaron Russell during the days of his pilgrimage saw the coming and going of 87 years. For 67 years he was cheered on the way by the wife of his youth, who less than four months ago preceded him into the better world. To-day their children, responsible and respected members of society, unitedly lift their voices in grateful praise of him because of his unflagging faithfulness to his family. Men covet the plaudits of the multitude, the encomiums of the eloquent and the distinguishing marks of honor received at the hands of the mighty; but we believe that in the light of truth all such testimonials pale into insignificance when compared with the simple tribute, flowing from the hearts and lips of sons and daughters, testifying to the faithfulness of a parent who dealt kindly and lovingly with those in his power within the sacred precincts of his home, away from the sight of men.

These children reverently pay such a tribute to their father, and we would urge you who hear that as pilgrims you seek to cultivate the confidence and love of those nearest you in order that they may sing your praises when your day is done, even as these find pleasure in declaring the fidelity of their father, our brother, to his family.

Through another set of actions we get a glimpse of the real Aaron Russell and realize that to a most remarkable degree he was generous to his friends. There is a studied and ostentatious generosity often shown by men who evidently intend that it shall inure to their immediate benefit or serve to facilitate the progress of their plans in the future; but, in the generosity of our departed brother, no such ends could have been had in mind. While yet of a sound and alert mind, he called his son and ordered the production and destruction of all his personal papers that had to do with the material indebtedness of his friends to him in order that discomfiture might not befall them because of his departure. Certainly, this was a most remarkable demonstration of unalloyed generosity. As a pilgrim he set the example that teaches that in passing on our way we should strew the pathway over which our fellows must follow with the gladsome flowers of kindness instead of the pricking thorns of anguish. His decision harmonized with the petition, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors."

By the hasty judgment of casual friends Aaron Russell was characterized as pugnacious, but to the eyes of sympathetic friends his so-called pugnacity stood discovered as a fixed principle to stand firmly by his honest convictions. What seemed to have been a fault we must regard as a virtue. Instead of condemning him for his obstinacy we should pray God that all of us might be more determined to stand stubbornly by our hearts' convictions, yielding only to the clear voices of reason, justice, and truth.

If Americans would stand firmly by their convictions as to the undeniable meaning of our Constitution for which these Stars and Stripes stand instead of the existing turmoil, misery, and woe which afflict our land, we should see our country converted into a veritable paradise within the space of a year. May we so live that men may say of each of us that during the days of our pilgrimage we were ever willing to go down with the things in which we believed. We should praise our brother for his positive teaching of so salutary a lesson.

How did this pilgrim respond to the call to cooperate in rendering service with and for his fellowmen?

We are informed in the brief sketch of his life, as just read, that he entered the service of our Government in 1861, and that he served continuously, faithfully, and efficiently until his retirement a very short time ago. The very fact that he rendered cheerful service for three score years without noteworthy advancement or hope of significant promotion reveals him as a man of rare parts. To look for a generation upon the procession of men moving from stations of inferiority to stations of superiority, and frequently helping them from posts below to posts above him, and to realize that the accident of color was the effective barrier against his own advancement, notwithstanding his merit and efficiency, and continue to render cheerful service, must convince us that this man was a prince in the midst of his nominal superiors if patient endurance be accounted a virtue.

In our scramble to pay homage to men made great by men we often thoughtlessly trample upon men made great by God. I personally believe that there is not a village or hamlet that has not this year laid away among its dead a man who, according to his real merit in the sight of God, was worth more than the most widely known political potentate in our public life. So do we believe that this pilgrim was one of nature's noblemen and that in enduring patiently and loyally such conditions as would have provoked others to rebellion he evinced a spirit that well might rebuke the impatient and ennoble, through genuine humility, the proud.

The most important thing that we can say on this occasion with reference to pilgrim Aaron Russell is that, like Jacob of old, he knew the God of his fathers and for nearly 50 years tried to follow His Son Jesus Christ. For nearly a half century he was a member of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church and for many years served efficiently in official capacity. Because of physical disabilities he had not been able to take an active part in the work of the church since my arrival upon the field, but his abiding interest in the church and its affairs manifested itself upon our meeting together in his home. Here in this room we have often lifted up our voices together in prayer. When his weakened physical condition compelled him to deny himself the company of his friends, upon the advice of his physician, he had it distinctly understood that the restriction must not apply to his minister. As a pilgrim he invited and welcomed such assistance as his minister could render in helping him to follow his Guide, even Jesus Christ, who Himself had traveled every step of the way through this strange country.

How unwise we should be to proceed farther with breathless uncertainty on our journey, to go gropingly into the midst of the imminent dangers that each new hour disposes about our pathway; to risk plunging into the chasm of unutterable disaster along the brink of which we ignorantly walk; to jeopardize, by an ill-timed step, both our temporal well-being and our eternal happiness, when stretched out toward us is the hand of the infinite God who guarantees us safe conduct if we are but willing to acknowledge our own need and accept His proffered aid. May we wisely own that we are pilgrims, and trust in the guidance of Him who sent us forth upon our journey and who will lead us safely through life, through death, and into the land of promise without the loss of a single faithful follower.

His pilgrimage is over. He was faithful to his family; generous in dealing with his friends; firm in his convictions; faithful and patient in his duties; and loyal to his church and to the cause of His Lord, the Christ. Our pilgrimage is yet to end. May we bless our fellow men through following our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and enter at last into our eternal home, the fatherland of our souls.

I will also insert the address made by the present Clerk of the House, William Tyler Page, who knew Aaron Russell for nearly a half century, and whose testimony as to his character and worth should be made a matter of public record, as follows:

To the eloquent words just uttered I feel I can add little or nothing in the way of eulogy, but I do feel that I must lay my tribute of affection and esteem at the feet of our brother who lies here.

I wish, Doctor Taylor, that the words you have spoken so eloquently and so truly could be incorporated in the official document, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for it was in the House of Congress that this man served the greater part of his mortal life. Few remain who knew him, none remain who knew him better than I, and none loved or respected him more than I for his real worth as a man.

Forty-six years ago on the 19th of this month I entered the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives as a mere boy, and the first to take my hand in a helpful spirit and to become my guide and mentor was he whose mortal remains lie here.

Yes; I am proud to say that he and I were fast and warm friends. I am grateful for the life and friendship of my friend Aaron Russell. He was a man in every sense of the word. A man of strong principles, religious and political beliefs, which he would never compromise.

I feel a sense of personal loss, and if it were not that I entertain, as did he, those same fundamental convictions, based upon what we call our religion, I should be as St. Paul said—without hope. But I regard this beautiful life that has ceased its pilgrimage here and has continued its pilgrimage in the life beyond as a wonderful example to all of us. An example of strong character, an example of correct living, an example of unswerving attachment to things that have been proven to be right, and, about all, an example of that perfect life which he tried throughout his existence to emulate; for Aaron Russell was a Christian gentleman if there ever was one, and he never forgot it, and he never hesitated to proclaim it by word and example.

I have served with him in the Capitol as a subordinate, as an equal, and as a superior, and I have always found him the same—true to his ideals, unswerving in his beliefs, and of undoubted rectitude of character. And I want to say to you that you could not find a man whose character furnished a better example.

Now, friends, I can not say more; it would be superfluous; but what I say comes from a heart that is grateful for having known and served with Aaron Russell, and I look upon him now as having just begun a better pilgrimage to that house of many mansions, where he will be greeted with those words, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

We call it death, but He Who went before opened the tomb and made it a gate to eternal life. We look no more upon a closed tomb. He who brought life to us is on the other side of the vale to welcome this pilgrim. So to-day I suppress those natural feelings which come into the breast of a true friend and rejoice that this life has entered into the life eternal, and say in the words of St. Paul, fourteenth chapter, First Corinthians: "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, as this man was steadfast, unmovable as this man was unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article appearing in the Dallas News on farm relief legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article printed in the Dallas News. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11133, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11133) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the special order the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] has two hours and the gentleman from Nebraska 30 minutes.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a few days ago, to be exact on the 17th of February, I took occasion on the floor of the House to make a few comments on the significance of the so-called McMaster resolution which was adopted by the Senate of the United States by an overwhelming vote on the 16th of January.

I took occasion at that time to call the attention of the House—and it seems to have attracted some attention outside of the House, particularly from some Members of the House and their constituents, to the apparent great conflict of opinion existing between the representatives of a group of Northwestern States in another body, and their representatives on this floor as registered by their vote on the parliamentary question that came up, tending to show that the representatives on the floor did not agree in the opinion as reflected by the representatives of those States in the Senate of the United States.

Now, gentlemen, that is an important question in this country, in my opinion, and I want to preface my remarks by saying that what I have to say on this issue is without any intention of causing any political trouble to my Republican associates on the floor; but it is an issue of grave importance to the agricultural and business interests of the people of this entire country, especially those who have been clamoring here at the doors of Congress for many years for some relief to agriculture.

My good friend, one of the Representatives from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]—and I am glad that he is here—on the day following my speech arose and undertook to excuse or to explain the votes of his associates from his State and from the other States who voted upon that question directly opposed to the vote of their representatives in another body—by saying it was merely a formal vote and had no real economic or political significance.

But I respectfully submit, gentlemen, that that is not the case. That Senate resolution came to this body freighted with profound political and economic significance. It had been discussed for many days in the Senate of the United States, and the representatives of those great Northwestern States were appealing to their colleagues to pass a resolution expressing their opinion upon this grave economic question of farm relief.

They were not indulging in a mere waste of time, a mere legislative gesture. I have no doubt the consciousness of the grave position of agriculture in their section of the country as reflected by bank failures and the foreclosure of mortgages and undertaking to find some solution of the question working adversely to their interests, those Senators conceived that one thing working against agriculture was the excessive tariff in the present schedules, forcing them to buy in a protected market a great number of things they have to consume and selling their commodities in the open markets of the world. And they registered that opinion in the solemn record of the Senate before the people of this country, and recognizing as they did the constitutional limitation of their power that all bills controlling revenue must originate in the House of Representatives, they deliberately placed in the last article of that resolution a request that that Senate resolution be respectfully referred to the House of Representatives.

For what purpose? Just to come over here and lie on the table in front of the Speaker, a mere formal gesture, or was it their intention that it should have some force and effect as their solemn opinion upon their own Representatives in this body toward the agricultural interests which they represented? That resolution asked that those excessive industrial schedules be revised downward and at this session of Congress.

The minority leader, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, moved to refer that Senate resolution to the only place on earth where the wish of the Senate of the United States could have any hope of being carried into effect, to the Committee on Ways and Means, the committee that must originate tariff legislation and that has the power to repeal the excessive rates they were declaring against. The point of order was made by the Republican leader, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the Speaker sustained the point of order. It is my humble opinion, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] said on that occasion, that that was a decision without parliamentary philosophy to back it. I believed then and I believe now that this House has a right to control the disposition of any paper that may come before it, whether from the Senate or anywhere else, and that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was a proper motion, upon which the expression of this House should be obtained.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. BANKHEAD. And that feeling is entirely mutual.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I served with the gentleman on the Rules Committee. I do not desire to embarrass him——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, the gentleman is not going to embarrass me, I assure him.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Would the gentleman, if he had been in the chair, have ruled differently from what the Speaker ruled on that occasion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I certainly would have.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That is where we differ—purely on the ruling.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Otherwise I should never have made the statement which preceded the gentleman's inquiry. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] moved to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Speaker, and then our friends on the Republican side began to squirm a bit, I have no doubt. They say that it had no economic or legislative significance, but it was loaded to the guards with that very thing, for the reason that if you had voted with your representatives in another body on that question you would have sent this resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means, and then those who think as they thought about the necessity for revising some of these excessive schedules would at least have had an opportunity to have gone before that committee, controlled by the Republican Party, and have said, "Here is a solemn prayer and petition from a great group of men in the Republican Party, representing, as they do, a great agricultural section of the country." And you would have had the opportunity at least to express your views as to whether those schedules should be revised. But you wanted to take the shortest cut and get out from under this responsibility. You wanted to say, "We will follow the party organization; we think the Speaker is sound in his ruling, and we side-step this whole proposition by sustaining the ruling of the Chair."

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. The men in the West, through their representatives in the Senate, if they really believed in a revision of the tariff schedules, could have gone to the Committee on Ways and Means by a bill or petition, without coming in this irregular way, could we not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that would have been a much more circuitous and unjustified policy than by direct expression of opinion which they indulged in. They took the short cut, and those who voted to keep it away from the Committee on Ways and Means in this House took a roundabout way to chloroform and kill it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Are there any tariff bills now before the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Has the gentleman appeared before that committee in an effort to get any of them out of the committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; of course I have not; but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], a Democrat, has a bill pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, and I call the attention of the western Representatives on the Republican side of the House to the proposal of that bill. It proposes to reduce the present excessive schedules on a great many of the industrial items the farmer has to buy, which the farmer now holds are excessive, and at the same time proposes an increase in the tariff on some or a great many of the articles of agricultural production that you western Representatives say are not now properly protected; so that you have an opportunity, if you desire, to use that as the basis of legislation along the lines of tariff relief which you profess to desire to accomplish at this session of Congress.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. In order to keep the record straight, I think the gentleman from Alabama should know, and also the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], that the Republican membership of the Committee on Ways and Means has already decided, and has decided two or three times, not to have even any discussion of tariff legislation at this session of Congress or any hearing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no doubt that is a correct statement, because I do not hear it denied by the distinguished chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who is present and who heard it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I did not hear the statement.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I made the statement that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, controlled by the Republican Party, 15 Republican members and 10 Democratic members, has already decided that they would have no hearings on the tariff question or open it up in any way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know how the gentleman knows that.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Because I was there when the committee voted on it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, I challenge the statement of the gentleman and appeal to the record.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Oh, yes. The committee voted two or three times on that proposition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Do you intend to have any hearings on the tariff question or open up the tariff question at this session of Congress?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer that question at the proper time.

Mr. OLDFIELD. And now is the proper time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman should not make the statement that he has made.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I say that that statement is correct. Do you deny it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The record will not show that, the record of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Do you deny now that you are not going to do it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not deny it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Would the sending of the McMaster resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means have changed the situation in the slightest degree in relation to the tariff, or any action upon it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, my friend well knows that the only way for you gentlemen to get any tariff relief, if you want any—and I do not know whether the gentleman from South Dakota wants any or not——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman wants agricultural relief without doubt.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. I was just coming to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman answer that one question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and I will go on to answer the gentleman's other remarks, and I am glad of the opportunity. The gentleman has been here a number of years, and he knows that the only way in the world to get agricultural relief by a tariff bill is through legislation coming from the Committee on Ways and Means; and although the gentleman was not here to vote on it the other day, his party voted to keep away any effort to revise the tariff, when the resolution came up, and if he and they had not done that they could secure it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If we can get enough votes on the Democratic side of the House for the McNary-Haugen bill I think we can get relief.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, so far we have no McNary-Haugen bill. The gentleman from South Dakota in a speech made a few days ago said, "We are going to wait a little longer and see if we can at this session of Congress secure the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill, and if we can not do that—and the gentleman in saying that was reflecting the views of many Members on the Republican side and many Members on the Democratic side——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I have 10 additional minutes?

Mr. CASEY. I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then they say, "If we can not get a vote on the McNary-Haugen bill we will join with the Republican Senators from the northwest section of the country, and with the Democrats who believe in tariff revision, and try to see whether, through that instrumentality, we can not get some agricultural relief.

Now, gentlemen, the time has now come to "talk turkey," to use a colloquial expression, on agricultural and farm relief. The Committee on Agriculture has been holding hearings every year on the McNary-Haugen bill for five or six years past. That bill was passed by the last Congress and vetoed by the President of the United States. Reams and stacks and volumes of testimony were taken concerning all phases of the question of agricultural relief before the Committee on Agriculture. I dare say not one visible phase of it, of any agricultural or economic significance was omitted in the investigation and exploitation of the subject in all its angles before that committee. What the farmers of this country want, if we are to get anything, is to get some definite action on that bill. Now, will some representative of the Committee on Agriculture, and of the party in power give us to-day some assurance of what is to be done on that question and as to what character of bill is to be brought out?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. The gentleman is not on that committee. I want some one to speak on the question with authority.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman what he will do as to voting on that bill if they did report it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will vote for it. I voted for it before. The gentleman and his colleagues ought to bring it forward and give us an opportunity to vote on it. [Applause.] You ought to bring it in and let us have a vote on it. The time is passing. It is now nearly the 1st of March, and only two or three months more of this session remain. You ought to decide the question whether you want that bill voted on or take your chances in some other way. There was a great soliloquy in one of Shakespeare's great tragedies, Hamlet. It starts out with—

To be or not to be, that is the question.

Now, on this legislative proposition it seems that something else has occurred in the way of a soliloquy, and that is "to fee or not to fee, that is the question"; whether you are going to bring in a bill with the equalization fee in it or not. That is not yet been determined.

But, gentlemen, I say in all seriousness and in all candor that the agricultural interests of this country are entitled speedily to a report, and are entitled now to a report, from that committee. But you are not going to secure the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill at this session. No one who is candid with himself on that proposition can hope to secure that result so long as President Coolidge entertains his present views on the McNary-Haugen bill in its present form.

Why do not you recognize that situation and bring a tariff bill in here and put it upon issue and do something with it? I say it is the duty of the Republican organization in this House that they should meet and determine by a majority of this House to take up seriously the question of a real revision of the tariff in this country, which your own farmers now recognize and so many of your own Senators now recognize is working a great hardship on the agricultural interests of this country.

You say this question is causing some trouble. I do not know what the gentleman's trouble is out in that western country, whether it is economic or political, but it seems to be a matter that is now generally discussed in that section of the country and will be discussed more and more as time goes on, and those people out there and the agricultural people elsewhere have long realized that the excessive tariff on the things the farmer must consume works hurt to him and disadvantage.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. KETCHAM. Of course, I am not assuming to speak for the Committee on Agriculture, but I want to assure the gentleman that the hearings this year are very exceptional in their character, and they are expected to be concluded very shortly. The present delay is for the purpose of allowing the proponents of the McNary-Haugen bill to be heard. I think I can assure the gentleman, while I do not speak authoritatively for the committee, that within the shortest possible time an agricultural bill in some form will be before the House for consideration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman give us the assurance that it will be in substance the McNary-Haugen bill as reported and voted upon at the last session of Congress, including the equalization fee in it?

Mr. KETCHAM. I can not give the gentleman that assurance, but I can say that the hearings are exceptional and if the gentleman will do the committee the honor of reading those hearings he will find, even as astute a student of agricultural problems as he is, some fine information that has not appeared in other hearings.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I ask the gentleman whether he himself is in favor of the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will say very directly and emphatically that I am not. I would regard it as an absolutely futile gesture to present that bill to the President of the United States with his known objections to it. I further submit that it seems to me it is the idlest sort of a gesture for you to carry on that idea with the notion that you are going to fool the farmers into the idea that you are the real friends of farm relief if you pursue that course.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There are a good many men on your side who seem to stand by the theory of making that gesture and undertaking to fool the farmers.

Mr. KETCHAM. If that shall be the majority opinion of the committee I am entirely agreeable to their having the utmost opportunity and I shall not interpose any objection except by my vote against it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] for extending me 10 minutes in which to discuss a matter of considerable importance not only to my constituents but, I believe, of importance to the people of this country.

Ordinarily I would not rise to discuss this subject, for the reason that I have discussed it frequently before, and I crave the indulgence of the Members assembled here to-day for imposing upon them for a few minutes, because it might be regarded as an imposition in view of the fact that I have, ever since I came to Congress, been accorded the honor on the 8th of January yearly of speaking in regard to the importance of the Battle of New Orleans. Of course, the 8th was on Sunday this year. Congress was not in session, and no one from any of the States that are particularly interested in the significance of that victory could speak of the imperishable glory won by Jackson and the wonderful results that flowed from the success of American arms on that battle field.

On that day, my friends, I was in New Orleans and had the honor of speaking, at the request of the United Daughters of 1776 and 1812, in probably one of the most historic squares on the American Continent. It is Jackson Square in the city of New Orleans. On the north and south sides that square is flanked by buildings that are known to lovers of art from one end of this country to the other, from ocean to ocean, and from the Great Lakes to the Mexican sea, as it has been felicitously termed. On the west side of that square is a cathedral, the replica of the chapel at Versailles erected by order of Louis XIV. Over the main altar is Louis IX announcing the seventh crusade. It is said to be one of the finest paintings in America. In that cathedral services were held commemorating and celebrating with appropriate musical and ecclesiastical ceremonies the success of American arms on the fields of Chalmette. On one side of the cathedral is the celebrated Cabildo, in which was consummated the Louisiana Purchase, the greatest land transaction in the history of the world. On the other side is the replica of the Cabildo, known as the bishopric. As I said, ladies and gentlemen in the galleries and my fellow Members, that square is probably one of the most historic squares on the American Continent. One feels, when he is standing in that hallowed spot, that the words, "Take off your sandals; you stand on holy ground," would be entirely applicable. In that square is one of the three great equestrian statues erected to the memory of Andrew Jackson. The work is that of the celebrated sculptor, Clark Mills. One is at Nashville, one is at New Orleans, and one is here in Jackson Square, opposite the White House.

I am speaking, as I said before, my friends, at the request of the United Daughters of 1776 and 1812, because on the day I spoke they asked me if I would not communicate the fact that they, the daughters, held this great meeting in that hallowed spot, in that wonderful square, among those historic surroundings, and ask the Members of Congress to pass a bill which I have pressed here since I first had the honor of coming to Congress.

That battle field, my friends, belongs to the National Government. On it is erected a monument which cost $25,000 years and years ago. As the result of a provision in the old act whereby the custody, care, and control of the grounds and the monument were given to the United Daughters of 1776 and 1812, the Federal Government has been prohibited from doing anything in regard to that monument or the grounds on which it stands.

I speak occasionally upon this subject, my friends, in a feeling way, because I was born and reared right adjoining that battle field.

When I think of its desolate condition, when I look upon the fact that one of the most important spots in the United States of America is neglected and that Americans who journey down there from all parts of the United States bow their heads in shame and express that sorrow at the neglect of the Federal Government with respect to this battle field, I feel I ought to come before the Members of this House and ask them to write either me or the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs asking for the passage of the bill which I have introduced, and which I hope will become a law, and which will permit the Federal Government to take control of this battle field and with a small expenditure put it in such a condition that it will not be a disgrace to the American people.

I believe, my friends, in maintaining a proper reverence for the landmarks of America, for its great institutions, and for its great battle fields. [Applause.]

This battle, in my judgment—and I do not think this has been seriously controverted by any people who have studied history—determined that the Louisiana Purchase should be a part of the United States of America. It is true that Jefferson purchased the Louisiana Territory from France for the sum of $15,000,000. This is a matter of history, but everyone knows who has looked into the record of the whole transaction that Spain conveyed to France by a secret treaty the Louisiana Territory and that act was ultra vires of the powers of the ambassadors or commissioners of Spain and was denounced by England and Spain as a legal fraud.

France conveyed no better title to the United States of America than it had received from Spain, and when Pakenham landed down below New Orleans it was for the purpose of recovering territory that belonged to the ally of England—Spain—and if this had been done the Spanish flag would be floating west of the Mississippi River to-day or that territory would be another Canada, and the United States of America would be confined to the territory lying between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic Ocean and the Lakes and the Florida parishes, which was transferred to England in 1763, one year after France had transferred the Louisiana west of the Mississippi River to Spain.

But aside from the wonderful importance of the battle from this standpoint, my friends, I want to say to you that the great victory of Jackson on Chalmette Plains was of incalculable value from another standpoint. The War of 1812 was the greatest tragedy the American people ever had to face. Vicissitude after vicissitude, disaster after disaster, befell our arms, and I am not mentioning it with any gratification, I mention it reluctantly and only for the purpose of driving home the everlasting truth that a house divided against itself can not stand [applause], and in order for the people of our country to be successful in peace and in war there must be no sectionalism, they must be arm to arm, heel to heel, and shoulder to shoulder. You know that during the War of 1812 the Hartford Convention sprung into existence and New England was threatening to secede. They were not in favor of the war, and as a consequence the British forces landed and the American troops fled ignominiously before them. The Capitol was burned and the school children of America were crying in the streets of the cities, villages, and hamlets over the disgrace that had befallen their country. There was no united effort to repel the foe. There was that division, that schism, that discontent, that will always make for disaster and the breaking down of the morale of the people, and America would have emerged from that war with nothing to boast, except for the outcome of this great battle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. The value or one of the great values to be attached to this battle was that it revived the broken morale of the American people. It restored confidence in the attitude that they were able, when united and standing heel to heel and shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart, to beat any foe that might ever invade the American continent, and Kentuckians and Tennesseeans and Mississippians and Louisianians, with one common purpose in view, and that was to control the Mississippi River and repel the foe, went down to New Orleans under the invincible Jackson and the veterans of the peninsular wars went down as if stricken by a hurricane, and the men who afterwards took part in the Battle of Waterloo were routed horse, foot, and dragoons.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. That battle also created more respect for the American flag among foreign nations than any battle that was ever fought on American soil.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I am glad to receive that statement.

Mr. RANKIN. And it was the first battle and the outstanding battle that raised the United States to the position of a world power.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Unquestionably.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we were broken, broken in spirit, broken in heart, and everyone believed that the States were going to disintegrate and go back to the protection of the mother country or that we would have a country made up of New England, a country made up of the Southern States, and that beyond the Mississippi would be a new country entirely made up by Americans who had crossed the Mississippi River and were not contented with conditions that obtained or they would have cemented an alliance with Spain or England.

You heard Washington's address read here on yesterday, in which he assured the people of American blood along the Mississippi River that by treaties with Spain and England that there probably would be no reason for discontent in the future.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. What, if anything, has been done to preserve and maintain this battle field?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Nothing. I want to touch briefly upon that, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question.

In 1907 Congress authorized the completion of this monument at a cost of $25,000. There are monuments in cemeteries all over the United States far more pretentious and far more deserving to be called monuments than this little modest affair on the battle field where Jackson's headquarters were. But a provision was inserted in the act whereby the custody and care and control of the battle field was given to the United Daughters of 1776 and 1812.

My friends, the people of the Southern States are not overrich. All we have are our memories and our prestige that have sprung from a service devoted to our States, to our God, and to our people. Of course, this organization took it over very proudly, hoping they would be able to accomplish the purpose, but they can not, and they have now authorized me to ask the Federal Government to take care of its own property. They can not carry on, though they have heroically tried to do so. This will not be a great expense, and in my judgment, gentlemen, it will not only be a patriotic act but it will be an act of decency because, as the battle field is to-day, it is a reflection upon the patriotism of the American people.

Why, it signifies that they are willing to forget the influence of these great battle fields in the history of America, that they are not mindful of the wonders accomplished and the tremendous results that flowed from that great battle.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Inasmuch as the strong arm of the Government goes out to preserve these monuments and their proper dedication on the battle fields throughout the United States, does the gentleman believe that the people of New Orleans should be compelled through civic organizations to perpetuate this battle field?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I do not want to occupy any more time. I have carried out the commission at the request of these good ladies. I was reluctant to comply with their request because I have spoken so frequently on this subject, but I am glad I have done so. May I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an article written by Mr. Clifford Raymond in the Liberty Magazine, which contains probably the best account that I have read up to this time of the Battle of New Orleans? Its leading title should be "Lest we forget." It is strong medicine in some respects, but nations, like individuals, need strong medicine. It should keep us in mind forever of the great national truth, "In union there is strength"—that a house divided against itself can not stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JACKSON AT NEW ORLEANS—THE STORY OF A CAMPAIGN THAT SAVED THE WEST

By Clifford Raymond

The fourth battle to keep New Orleans out of British hands was fought January 8, 1815. It was decisive, almost obliterating the British, and is celebrated now as Jackson Day.

The first one, fought December 23, 1814, was a night attack by the Americans on the British advance regiments which had landed from small boats off Lake Borgne, taking the defenders of the city by surprise. This was on plantation lands along the Mississippi, 7 miles below the city to the southeast—lands skirted by cypress swamps and marshes.

The night fight was a confused affair, with friends mistaken for enemies and enemies for friends. The British kept the field. The second meeting had been a grand reconnaissance by the British to test the American line. The third had been an artillery duel, with the infantry of the two armies as spectators. The British artillerymen were outshot and driven from their guns.

British officers, experienced in America—such as those who had met Joshua Barney's artillery at Bladensburg, Md., a few months before—were prepared for that, but the soldiers more recently come from the Napoleonic wars were not. It was inexplicable that American artillery could outshoot British guns.

Bladensburg had been the capsheaf of national disgrace. Only Barney's sailor-manned artillery relieved the incompetence and panic. New Orleans later was an astonishing victory. There was some difference in the quality of American troops engaged, but most of the difference was in one man—Andrew Jackson.

The United States was down to the dregs of the cup of humiliation when the New Orleans campaign began. Its credit was gone. Its specie was gone. It was dissolving. The New England States had definitely withdrawn their militia from Federal service.

Massachusetts and Rhode Island were negotiating what was virtually a treaty of defense and alliance, as if one were Mexico and the other Guatemala. The Hartford Convention had begun, and it was, without much cover, an assemblage of secessionists.

Massachusetts was bustling with few factories, and, in spite of its closed ports, it and the other New England States had all the hard money in the country. Elsewhere the large banks were broke.

James Monroe, Secretary of State, had to pledge his personal credit to get a nickel for the Government. He was always flat himself, but his credit was better than that of the United States. In 1814 $40,000,000 was needed. Congress dared authorize an issue of only $25,000,000 in bonds and the Treasury dared offer only $10,000,000, of which $9,000,000 was jobbed out at 88 per cent of its face value.

New England would not buy bonds. It had the largest and best-equipped militia (80,000), but would not allow it to be used by the United States; and it was spending its specie to discount British drafts for enemy army paymasters; and it was getting the hard money back by selling supplies to the British commissary.

New England and upper New York subsisted the enemy army in Canada for its attacks from the north, driving cattle across the boundary and hauling in forage, grains, and mess supplies.

Sir George Prevost, the British commander, wrote his home office that his army was fed by the Yankee supplies.

Sedition, secession, disgrace, and dishonor had been pyramided upon the fragile Republic in sectional rivalries and partisan ignominies until union was a mockery and national stability was a comedy.

The Union was so nearly done for that the most radical secessionists in Massachusetts waited only for the capture of New Orleans to make it a fact. Then John Cabot would be President of New England. For every New England man who died under Brown, Scott, Macomb, Perry, and MacDonough, 10 fractious theorists, profit seekers, and blind partisans did work in the rear which made that sacrifice futile.

Madison was sick with anxiety. The city of Washington was taken, the public buildings were burned, the President of the United States was a fugitive in the Virginia woods, and his wife, fleeing in a coach, was subjected to the insults, profanity, and obscenity of a panic-stricken rabble crowding the roads from the city they hadn't the courage to defend.

The cup was about drained, and New England secessionists watched with unmistakable satisfaction the failure of the war and the possible dissolution of the Union. Fully half of New England was loyal, but the other half seemed to have the upper hand.

There was a Unionist in the White House some 18 years later who was ready to hang John Calhoun for secession threats in South Carolina over the tariff. That President was Andrew Jackson, who at New Orleans had not been able to get muskets for all his soldiers, so badly had sedition and disunion broken the power and credit of his Government in war.

If the meaning of the sentiment in the flagstaff of this magazine needs explanation, it may be found in circumstances of its authorship.

Stephen Decatur was in command of American frigates in this war—of the United States, which captured the Macedonian; of the President, which was captured by a British squadron. His toast to "my country, right or wrong" comes to this generation from battle fields of American dead killed by soldiers fed by American beef and American breadstuffs when American soldiers could not get war material.

If Decatur seems ethically indifferent to debatable points of right or wrong, it may be because of his observation of the physical consequences of disunion, disloyalty, dissension, and discord.

The White House was burned in August, 1814. Decatur gave his toast in April, 1816. He was mortally wounded in a duel at Bladensburg in 1820. The cause was his country's military honor as he saw it in his controversy with James Barron, another naval officer.

It was the sardonic luck of the United States to declare war on Great Britain just as Napoleon was starting his self-wrecking campaign against Russia.

It was the further luck of the luckless Republic still to be at war when the allies were marching into Paris, when Napoleon was sent to Elba, and Great Britain, thoroughly irritated, was free to use as many of Wellington's veterans as might be needed in America.

The British used the West Indies as a base. The first rendezvous for the warships and transports was Bermuda. From there the expedition sailed to harry the coast of the Chesapeake, to burn public buildings in Washington, to raid the shores of the Patuxent and the Patapsco Rivers in Maryland, and attack Baltimore.

The purpose, as stated by the British admiral, Cochrane, in a letter to Secretary of State Monroe, was "to carry into effect measures of retaliation against the inhabitants of the United States for the wanton destruction committed by their Army in Upper Canada" and "to destroy and lay waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable."

The distracted Government in Washington could do nothing to save the National Capital, and a contemptuous enemy stacked up the President's furniture and applied the torch. Dolly Madison had time before flight to have a negro servant save the portrait of Washington.

Baltimore defeated the attack and the expedition sailed away, leaving ravaged shores.

The second rendezvous again was in the convenient West Indies. This time the warships and transports anchored in broad Negril Bay, in Jamaica, 50 vessels, with the 80-gun Tonnant as flagship. More troops joined the army there—Major General Keane's four regiments of Wellington's peninsular veterans and the Praying Highlanders of the Ninety-ninth Regiment from the Cape of Good Hope.

There were 3,100 men who had been in the taking of Washington, 1,500 marines, two regiments of Jamaica negroes, and probably 10,000 sailors. The British troops were the flower of the army, and a touch of at least reflected genius was to be found in Maj. Gen. Sir E. Pakenham, Wellington's brother-in-law.

This was November. The Gulf coast was the object of attack, and New Orleans, it could be seen, was the almost certain point. At New Orleans there was nothing but a governor quarreling with the legislature, a population which was supposed to regret its recent incorporation into the United States with Napoleon's sale of the Louisiana Territory, and of this populace a few hundred creole gentlemen drilling in uniformed companies. But there was to be Andrew Jackson, and the creole gentlemen proved that their loyalty to their new country was gunpowder proof.

The war was as nearly a religion in the American West as obstruction to it was an article of faith in New England. Ohio, Indiana, the Northwest Territory, Kentucky, and Tennessee had not been interested in the avowed causes of it.

The impressment of seamen, indignities to American sovereignty on the sea, interference with trade, and maritime humiliation and injury did not affect western corn planters and fur traders, but the continuance of the Indians in western land did.

The success of the Revolution had not ended the British-Indian alliance for the restriction of the American westward advance. English profit and Indian profit each required the stemming of the pioneers.

Tecumseh's great plan of Indian union—the second and last of a native statesman, Pontiac's being the first—had been disclosed prematurely because the evangelistic end of it, his brother, the Prophet, broke loose too soon. William Henry Harrison had his bare victory at Tippecanoe, near Fort Wayne, Ind., the year before war was declared on Great Britain for maritime reasons.

Tecumseh had reached far out for his confederation against the whites, and the Creeks of the South were the right wing of his hope. His left rested on the British outposts in Canada, and his center was in the tribes in the Northwest Territory.

Indians meant British intrigue to such men as Andrew Jackson. Every frontier leader knew that the new States and Territories could not have peace until Great Britain was persuaded to take another view of the westward American movement.

Tecumseh's evangel among the Creeks had shot the fiery arrow in August, 1813, when the white settlers had congregated in and about Samuel Mims's place above the Tombigbee and Alabama Rivers for protection. Mims's buildings had been stockaded, and there was a garrison of soldiers.

One drowsy August day it was stormed by 1,000 Creeks under the half-breed Weatherford. Four hundred soldiers and civilian men, women, and children were killed by the Indians.

The reverberating horror of that frontier disaster brought action, and, in the course of it, the great soldier of the frontier, Jackson. He was still suffering from the wound of his fight with the Bentons in the tavern at Nashville, and his intestinal disorders had a fresh grip on him; but he almost destroyed the Creeks as an Indian power. Jackson had the frontiersman's attitude toward the Indian and a great hatred of enemy whites who used them.

Pensacola was Spanish governed, but the British had not respected the neutral character of the Florida territory and the Spanish were agreeable to the British use of it. Pensacola had been a base of supplies for the Creeks and a refuge for escaped warriors—Red Sticks, as they were known.

While the British prepared to ravage the Chesapeake region and the Gulf coast with their Napoleonic veterans, Jackson was carrying on a private war with Spain to teach the Spanish governor what neutrality meant.

When he was ordered to the defense of New Orleans, he was preoccupied with the Spanish and the British along the Florida coast and what is now Alabama. He thought the British would attack Mobile, and almost up to his discovery of the enemy on the Villeré plantation, 7 miles from New Orleans, he maintained that opinion. When he was assembling troops for the Louisiana defense he left at Mobile at least 1,000 regular troops, seriously weakening himself.

President Madison and Secretary Monroe had information of the great invasion being prepared at the Jamaica base. The American peace commissioners sitting with the British at Ghent were standing firm against impossible British terms and were sending military intelligence to Washington.

The administration had much difficulty in bringing Jackson to see the real danger. Monroe wrote him that "Mobile is a comparatively trifling object with the British Government," and that Jackson's presence on the Mississippi River with the main body of his army was of vital importance.

Jackson did not yield to Washington's urgence until November 22, 1814, when he set out from Mobile. Four days later the British sailed from Negril Bay, Jamaica. Jackson was sick and traveled the 125 miles slowly.

He had sent General Coffee with his mounted riflemen to Baton Rouge. He had ordered the Forty-fourth Regular Infantry, 331 rank and file, to New Orleans, where the Seventh Regulars, 465 men, were stationed. His other forces were widely dispersed.

General Carroll's 2,500 Tennessee militiamen were coming down the Mississippi, and somewhere above them on the river were about the same number of Kentuckians under Generals Adair and Thomas.

There were also on the Ohio or Mississippi two boat loads of muskets. Both boats were proceeding leisurely, the captains, by agreement with the authorities, trading along the way. Fortunately, General Carroll found one boat and took the arms. Hinds's Mississippi Dragoons, 100 or so strong, were near Baton Rouge.

Jackson entered New Orleans December 2. He approached the town by the road along the Bayou St. John, which empties into Lake Pontchartrain on the north.

He met the Louisiana authorities, the quality folk, and Commodore Patterson, with the ships Carolina and Louisiana. Jackson said he could save New Orleans, and the people stopped some of their dissensions.

He was the object of great curiosity, particularly to the creole ladies, who viewed him with whatever prejudgments of his character they might have, as duelist or disciplinarian, bar-room fighter or Indian fighter, gallant husband or border bully. They found he had courtly manners, and when he said that New Orleans and its women were safe from the rumored British toast to "Booty and beauty," they believed him.

If the city anticipated the application of this sentiment in the event of capture, there was justification in the letter from Lord Bathurst to General Ross after the taking of Washington, before Ross's death was reported in England, to "make its [New Orleans's] inhabitants feel a little more of the effects of your visit than what has been experienced at Washington."

Jackson, as it was revealed later, had just three weeks to put the city in defense, and his preconceptions of how the attack would be made were all wrong. He thought the British would sail up the 100 miles from the Gulf to the city and put it under the navy guns. That would require the reduction of Fort St. Philip, 60 miles down. If the river route should not be used, Jackson thought the enemy would gain Lake Pontchartrain to the north and come down from there.

He devoted himself to inspections and to encouraging the local militia. Six gunboats on Lake Borgne were to apprise the general of an approach by the lakes and to resist a small boat attack if they could, the lake not being navigable for the British ships.

The British came to the lake entrance December 10. The watching gunboats under Lieutenant Jones retired into the lake. The British organized a boat party of 1,000, sailors and marines, which, after a rowing pursuit from the night of December 12 until noon December 14, caught the gunboats becalmed and captured them. That was 40 miles to the east of New Orleans and word of it reached the city the evening of December 15.

Jackson sent messengers to Coffee at Baton Rouge, and Carroll and Adair up the river, to hurry down. Coffee started on December 17 and traveled 120 miles in two days with 800 men, 450 being unable to keep the pace. Carroll's Tennesseeans were at the city's outskirts December 21.

It is strange that, with the approach of the British revealed by the capture of the gunboats, Jackson did not know where the enemy was. Its advance was on the Villeré plantation before its movements were unmasked to him.

British supplies and guns for the attack had to be transported 30 miles in small boats from the ships outside Lake Borgne, and it was a week's work. The advance was disembarked on the Isle aux Poix in the lake December 14.

The Villeré plantation was within 7 miles of the city, but two British officers successfully scouted the approach to it December 18, with Spanish fishermen from a village at the mouth of the Bayou Bienvenu as guides.

Along the river bank there was the levee and a road. The plantations extended back to a cypress swamp. Canals and bayous cut the ground. The scouts led the advance off the Isle aux Poix to the Villeré plantation so secretly the morning of December 22 that Major Villeré was captured in his own home.

By the next day 1,600 British troops were on the river bank less than 7 miles below the city, and neither Jackson nor anyone else there knew of it until messengers came running in with the alarm. One was Villeré, who had escaped and got into the city with the news.

New Orleans did not have a yard of earthworks to protect it; but if Jackson had been remiss thus far, he was so no longer. He was himself when he saw his enemy. He set about to do what few commanders would have done—to atack a post of the best troops of the age with about their same number of city volunteers; Louisiana militia, frontier riflemen, regulars, and sea smugglers and freebooters, outfits which had never operated together under any command, many never having been under fire.

The curiosities of the New Orleans campaign are many, not the least of which is the still prevailing American belief that there was but one short murderous battle, with American riflemen behind cotton bales.

Jackson hastily assembled Major Planché's battalion of creole volunteers, Hinds's dragoons, Beale's New Orleans sharpshooters, Coffee's riflemen, a few Choctaw Indians under Jugeant, negro freedmen under Dacquin, the Regulars, and some of the patriotic smugglers of the Lafitte brothers from their Baratarian roost. It was as strange a force as ever advanced under an American general.

Jackson marched out of the city with about 2,200 men, leaving half of his force as protection against an attack from the north. The British on the plantations by the river bank were under Colonel Thornton, who had led the attack at Bladensburg.

Pakenham had not yet taken command of the army, and Major General Keane, who had it, wanted all the forces assembled before he advanced. Thornton had about 1,900 in camp, and in the fighting he was reinforced by two regiments.

The Carolina dropped down the river in the afternoon and was to use its guns on the British right. Jackson sent Coffee's riflemen along the edge of the swamp to flank the British and, if possible, to get behind them. Jackson was to attack right, left, and center, and the guns of the Carolina were to give the signal.

At a little after 7 in the evening Commander Patterson sent his first shot into the British position, and the fight began in the dusk and was carried on in the dark. Coffee's men, coming out of the swamp, fought as they knew best—Indian fashion—and when too close for rifle fire, with knives, tomahawks, and rifle butts.

In the dark enemy and friend soon became indistinguishable. Even the British order was broken. Groups and detachments stumbled about in the night, advanced, retreated, fought, surrendered, died in each other's clutches, or hid. The British could not get full advantage of their superiority in discipline, but they had enough of it to keep the field. Coffee's men were involved with the reenforcements coming up, and that spoiled their encircling movement. Between 9 and 10 o'clock the firing ceased.

The losses were not excessive. Keane reported 267 killed and wounded; the Americans 213 killed, wounded, and missing. The steadiness of the British had saved them, but the American onset had been sufficiently daring to make the enemy respect the force defending the city.

Jackson hadn't driven the advance into the river, but he had caused it to lose the only opportunity of getting into the city without going over fortifications. Two miles from the field of this night attack he put soldiers and negroes to work throwing up earthworks in the land between the cypress swamp to his left and the river to his right.

After a few feet of digging, water would ooze up and it was difficult to raise the works. Cotton was tried. It was a failure, as the artillery duel proved later, and it was then dragged out.

For the Napoleonic veterans of the British Army the military situation was as trying as any they ever had been in. Physical conditions were distressing. It was cold and wet. They were miles from their source of supplies. The Carolina in the river fired on them, and although the casualties were not numerous a few cannon can make even a disciplined force miserable out of all proportion to the danger.

The small boats were bringing more men all the time, but the Carolina kept most of the force under cover. Worse still, the navy began to taunt the army for being held up. The British naval officers said that if the soldiers could not get going they would land the sailors and do the job themselves.

Pakenham, coming on the field Christmas Day, felt the ignominy of his position and sent back to the ships for cannon to dispose of the Carolina. The labor was tremendous, but by December 27 a battery was ready. Hot shot and shell drove the ship's crew ashore and the schooner was destroyed. The Louisiana, farther up the river, was hauled out of range.

Patterson, however, had succeeded in getting one 24-pound gun and two 12-pounders ashore to the west bank from the Carolina, but the British were free to move about on firm land without losing legs and heads, and that was a solace to the spirit.

It was time, Pakenham decided, to try a grand reconnoissance and test out what lay between him and New Orleans. He had 10 of the best British regiments, 2 regiments of West Indian black troops, brought along because of their supposed adaptability to the climate and now half frozen, and the support of numerous marines.

The advance began December 28. In less than 3 miles it came to Jackson's breastworks. There, under the fire from the Louisiana and the rifles from the American line, it stopped. Pakenham planned to breach the works with artillery and then storm.

More guns had to be brought from the British fleet. Meanwhile Jackson strengthened his batteries. The British guns were ready January 1, and the artillery duel began. If there was an advantage in metal and position, it was with the British, but after five hours' firing not a British gun was being served.

The British in their gun protections had used barrels of sugar, which were found to offer no protection whatever.

Jackson got his cotton from boats in the river. The New Orleans cotton merchant, Nolte, was a volunteer in Major Planché's battalion. He protested when high-grade cotton was taken off a boat of his and complained that a low grade, obtainable in the city, would serve just as well.

Tradition credits Jackson with the remark that if he owned the cotton he would have additional reason for defending the line. The cotton proved to be as unfit for fortification as the sugar. It caught fire and nearly demoralized the defense.

The American artillery superiority was undeniable when the royal artillerists had fled from their guns, and the British conceded it.

"Never was a failure more remarkable or unlooked for than this," the British lieutenant, Gleig, wrote in his journal of the campaign. Admiral Codrington, of the British Fleet, wrote that "such a failure in this boasted arm was not to be expected, and I think it a blot on the artillery escutcheon."

Some of the American artillerists were the Baratarian smugglers of the French brothers, Jean, Pierre, and Dominique Lafitte.

Since December 10 the greatest armada and the finest army Great Britain had ever sent to American waters had been approaching a city of a State but recently added to the American Union, with a population relied upon to be hostile to the Union, and the powerful expedition had been stopped cold by a strangely conglomerate army of defense under a gaunt, sick Indian fighter.

Pakenham prepared for a grand assault on both sides of the river. Secretly he extended a canal to get boats on the river. Major General Lambert was on his way with two regiments, and the delay for preparations was not wasted time. Pakenham wanted the reinforcements before he attacked.

The Kentuckians of Thomas and Adair reached the American camp, but they, unlike the Tennesseeans under Carroll, had not met a boatload of muskets, and they were not equipped.

When Pakenham's canal was dug he put his boats in the river and sent 1,000 men across under Colonel Thornton. The defense on the west bank of the river consisted of Patterson's battery facing the water, some works by Major A. L. Latour, and some Louisiana volunteers.

It was Jackson's weak side, but an enemy on the west river bank had the river to cross before he could get into New Orleans.

When Jackson discovered that Pakenham was putting men across to the west shore, he ordered some of the unequipped Kentuckians to double back the 5 miles to New Orleans, beg the citizens for the use of firearms saved out to meet a possible slave uprising, and, thus equipped, to ferry across and come back down the other bank.

The Kentuckians, with what they could get, went across the river and down to join the inadequate defense. They were exhausted when they arrived and ineffective when they were needed. And no wonder.

A deserter had crossed over to the British ranks from the American lines and had reported that the weakest spot in Jackson's defense was the left, toward the cypress swamp. There was where Coffee's riflemen were strung out. They reached to the swamp, and at its edge their line was run backward to prevent a possible flanking movement. It was a weak line when the deserter last saw it.

The British, after the slaughter which followed their attack, had enough vitality left in them to hang the deserter, he crying out against the injustice of it. Carroll's Tennesseeans had come into Coffee's lines, and the British attack, seeking a weak spot, had gone into the deadliest rifle fire.

The thing which Pakenham did in trying the attack was admittedly desperate, but so also was his whole position, in spite of his splendid army. He could not maneuver. There was no room. On one side was the river. On the other side was the marsh and swamp.

It was British tradition that troops could take a position in frontal attack, carrying material for filling ditches and ladders for scaling walls. It also was in the history of British regiments in America that they had not done it on many occasions; but Pakenham with his reputation to maintain, was convinced that he had to do it, even with Andrew Jackson animating the troops behind the breastworks.

Pakenham died rallying the men when they withered under the rifle and artillery fire. Before that fire, in 25 minutes, the storm troops of Great Britain disappeared. There were 700 killed, 1,400 wounded, and 500 taken prisoners. Major General Gibbs was mortally wounded, and Keane was seriously injured. The American loss was 8 killed and 13 wounded.

On the other side of the river the British drove the Kentuckians back. Their flight was inconsequential, except that it made Jackson mad and started a feud which lasted almost a lifetime with General Adair and Kentucky, the Kentucky folk thinking that they had been most miserably treated.

Jackson's night attack on the British was December 23. In Ghent, December 24, the American and British peace commissioners signed a treaty of peace. They were drinking each other's health when Jackson and the British were counting the dead. The news of the peace did not arrive until February, but before that the United States knew that the attempt to restore Louisiana to Spain or to set it up as a free nation had failed.

The Louisiana Purchase, stretching to the Pacific, was safe. The Mississippi was an American river. The threat of an Indian buffer State in the Northwest Territory between the Republic and Canada was gone. Great Britain was definitely out of American western affairs for the first time.

New England secession was stopped. The Government under President Madison had a gift of life from Andrew Jackson on the Mississippi a full month before it knew that the war was over.

In that month, if New Orleans had been taken, the peace signed at Ghent and unknown in the United States might have been only a postscript written to national disunion. With victory, the Union was a Union again, and it was the South which next would assert the right of withdrawal when the acts of the Union were unpleasant to a State. South Carolina was to take the place of Massachusetts in this respect.

Wellington was asked what explanation he had for the failure of his veterans. He said he did not know what might have been the matter with them. They had not seemed to be as good in Louisiana as they had been in Spain. He thought they lacked an iron will driving them.

Probably they lacked Wellington, but more probably their difficulty was that they met Jackson.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana are as one for this bill, and Members from all the other States have assured me of their support. At their request I am making the leading provisions of the measure a part of this address. I know this House is for the bill. The Members all want to see the old historic place where the good fight was fought properly taken care of, for, after all, we have the same hopes, aspirations, and desires—divided only as the waves, but one as the sea. I know that the Secretary of War will give his approval to the patriotic purpose that may be accomplished by the expenditure of a small, modest sum. It is flexible and elastic in its provisions, giving the Secretary of War the power to consummate the purpose in his own way, and when he sees fit to do so he will discharge that duty, I know, in accord with the dignity of the great trust that will be his. It is the Government's own property, and the Nation should and will be glad through him to do the noble thing. The bill directs him to submit annually to the Bureau of the Budget, in accordance with the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, an estimate of the amount required to be expended in connection with preserving and maintaining the monument and grounds in a suitable manner and in placing markers on the battle field so as to establish and fix the position of the several divisions of American and British troops; and place such statues and busts of American officers as he may deem necessary to perpetuate their valor and appropriately embellish the battle field. He shall also cause to be built and constructed, at a cost to be fixed by him, a memorial or shrine, which shall be a repository for such records, portraits, pictures, and trophies which may be presented by States, subdivisions thereof, and patriotic societies and organizations and persons of American birth, and accepted by the Secretary as appropriate to such an edifice.

Let the day be all the brighter, the night has been so long and so dark.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Mississippi 15 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman and Members of Congress: A great calamity has befallen our people. The inhabitants of the Mississippi Valley have fought against this tragedy for more than 200 years. No soldiers ever fought more valiantly or more honorably for their country and loved ones than the courageous souls who live along the banks of the Mississippi have fought for their home and country and loved ones in the years that have passed.

The people of the great Mississippi Valley have impoverished themselves and put a tremendous debt upon their children's children in an effort to cope successfully with the ever-increasing danger of this mighty stream. They have not complained. They have merely asked for that justice to which every citizen of our country is entitled.

The Mississippi River receives drainage from 31 States, or from an area that represents 41 per cent of the entire area of the United States. These waters thus drained come rushing like a mad torrent down upon these helpless people, and in an effort to control this almost uncontrollable stream these people, especially those who live in the lower Mississippi Valley, have spent and mortgaged their all. And after fighting this stream through all these years, and after they have exhausted their every resource to control it, they come now to that great mother of us all, the Government of the United States, to ask you to come to their rescue and to assume the responsibility that rightfully belongs upon the shoulders of the Government.

A GIANT OF 60,000,000 HORSEPOWER

The Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf is a 60,000,000 horsepower giant during flood. If this great power could be harnessed, Muscle Shoals would be but a useless pigmy in comparison.

But this 60,000,000-horsepower giant is largely spent in driving great volumes of water down the river, eroding banks, transporting silts, and beating a ceaseless and dangerous tattoo upon the levees along its course.

Even though only a fraction of its potential power is used, the Mississippi River, greatest in the world, is a direct servant to the continental United States in drainage, navigation, water supply, power, and other vital aids to manufacturing and agriculture.

It is the Nation's servant. Yet it is a source of great danger to a certain part of the Nation, and that endangered portion is not responsible for the condition that makes a sword of Damocles hang over its head night and day.

The people of the stricken and endangered area have a right, therefore, as expressed by the Staple Cotton Cooperative Association, of Greenwood, Miss.—

to ask that the Nation protect us from floods which originate in the national domain, and to do this not as a favor, but as a national duty, and as a good business proposition as well.

NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY NOT A NEW IDEA

National responsibility for the control of the Mississippi is not a new idea, born of the tragedy of 1927. It dates back to the very first days of this Republic. Washington and Jefferson, by word and action, made it plain that this greatest river of our continent was for the Nation to use and to control. The early statesmen of this Republic emphasized this responsibility of the Government for the river.

If the system be not national—

Said Henry Clay once in the United States Senate—

I should like to know one that is national.

President Lincoln said:

The most general object I can think of would be the improvement of the Mississippi River.

The statesmanship of America must grapple with the problem of this mighty stream—

Said President Garfield—

It is too vast for any State to handle; too much for any authority other than that of the Nation itself to manage.

President Roosevelt, after a visit to the valley, said:

We must build the levees and build them stronger and more scientifically than ever before.

And President Coolidge recognizes the responsibility of this Government, although he has, to date, indicated that the burden of this responsibility should be shared by the affected States. His party said, however, in a platform plank:

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare.

While the Democratic Party expressed it in this language:

We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of overflow of land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property imposes an obligation which alone can be discharged by the Federal Government.

Partisanship does not cast its selfish shadow across this humanitarian issue.

The tragedy of 1927 in the Mississippi Valley, followed by the disastrous floods in New England, has touched and united the hearts of the North and South in a common sorrow, and kindled in their hearts the desire that this Government shall not withhold its full protection from any stricken section over which the threat of a repetition of calamity still rears its ugly head.

IN MEMORY OF BEN HUMPHREYS

And while we are considering this great problem may we not pause for a moment, for my heart is in the grave with one who sleeps an eternal sleep in a beautiful little city built upon the very banks of this great stream, one who did much to stifle the foul spirit of partisanship that too often enters into our deliberations here.

If the great Benjamin G. Humphreys could speak to us now, he would plead for his Government to protect his people in the valley that he loved so well.

The fight that is now being carried on is but the culmination of his splendid efforts.

Ben Humphreys had more information about the Mississippi River and its problems than all the other students of this subject, and it would make him rejoice to-day to know that his friends of days gone by here in this body are fighting his battle for his people.

He threw to you gentlemen the torch when his faltering hands could hold it no longer. He bade you hold it high. And I know you are not going to break faith with Ben Humphreys, your friend, and the great servant of a great cause. [Prolonged applause.]

PROTECTION, NOT RECLAMATION

I desire to call your attention now to this statement from the message of President Coolidge read to the Seventieth Congress at its opening session last December:

The Government is not an insurer of its citizens against the hazard of the elements.

The Government does not undertake to reimburse its citizens for loss and damage incurred under such circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the Mississippi Valley are not seeking reimbursement for the tremendous damages they have suffered. They are not asking that this Government pay them back, dollar for dollar, or a cent for a dollar, for their losses in the 1927 flood or in any of the numerous floods previous to that time. They are not asking the Government to write insurance policies against the hazard of the elements.

But they are asking that their lives and property and general welfare be given the adequate protection guaranteed them under the Constitution as citizens of the United States.

Protection and not reclamation or reimbursement is the request of the people of the Mississippi Valley.

No more reasonable a plea ever came from the lips of a stricken people.

No request was more just nor filled with greater merit.

And no country in the history of all the world from its beginning to this hour was ever in better position to be able to help its citizens in time of a national crisis than is the Government of the United States to-day.

HOW THE PEOPLE HAVE PAID

For 125 years and more these people of the Mississippi Valley have not balked at one of the greatest works of reclamation ever undertaken by any people anywhere—

Said the Hon. Alf H. Stone, of Mississippi, in a memorandum submitted to the Flood Control Committee of the House.

They have spent uncounted millions in the task—speaking for the Yazoo Mississippi Delta area alone, we have still outstanding nearly $50,000,000 of bonds which represent money spent for drainage canals, highways, public buildings, schoolhouses, street paving, etc., and we are raising annually more than $10,000,000 in taxes.

These people ask no help of anybody toward completing this work of development and reclamation. All they ask is that what they have accomplished be protected against floods from elsewhere, that the fruit of their hundred years of toil be not destroyed by the waters of the Nation's greatest stream.

THE DEFINITION OF RECLAMATION

Mr. Chairman, we ask that the Government assume full responsibility for an adequate flood-control program.

We ask that it protect the lives and property of the people of the Mississippi Valley.

It is the land of this region that is to be benefited—

Said President Coolidge.

To say that it is unable to bear any expense of reclamation is the same thing as saying that it is not worth reclaiming.

But, as a matter of information and definition, let me say that reclamation of the rich land adjacent to the Mississippi River is not consummated by the simple building of an adequate levee system.

You might as well say that the building of levees on the Amazon in the wilds of South America reclaims the lands adjacent to this river and is, therefore, a reclamation project.

It is not. No land is reclaimed until it has people who will live on it and work it; until it has railways, highways, drainage, churches, schools, banks, health centers, markets, towns and cities filled with businesses, places of amusement and attraction; and the people of the Mississippi Valley have provided these things and have, therefore, by their own efforts and expenditure of time, energy, and money already reclaimed this land.

They have done this at the sacrifice of their profits, and after their own resources have been exhausted and their taxes paid and devoted largely to this purpose they have mortgaged their places until the major portion of their holdings is tied up in legal paper to loan companies, insurance companies, and brokerage houses.

But they began this reclamation in the first days of the history of the valley as a place for American citizens to live and toil for self and home and country; and they, having put their hands to the plow, have never turned back.

What they have reclaimed, therefore, they ask you now to protect.

WITH REFERENCE TO JADWIN

The Chief of Engineers of the United States Army at the time of the 1927 flood was Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, a native of Pennsylvania, a Regular Army man, now 63 years old, and who for 43 years has been in the military service of this Government.

It was his task to recommend an engineering program to prevent a repetition of the 1927 tragedy of the Mississippi. His assignment was technical.

It was neither his duty nor his province to make any recommendation as to where the money should come from to do the work or whether the Government should bear it all or just a part.

But his position as Chief of Engineers is of such importance at this time that whatever he says has a direct bearing upon flood-control program and legislation. And, either by his own free will and thought or by direction from a higher source, he recommended a division of the financial responsibility for flood control.

In full justice to General Jadwin I desire to say that I believe he has the finest possible grasp of the engineering task involved, but I do say that he exceeded his province when he tried to say where the money should come from to do the work or as to who should assume the responsibility. That is the province of Congress, and Congress alone.

BEWARE OF A MUSSOLINI OF FLOOD CONTROL

In putting the huge flood-control program into operation let us beware of creating a Mussolini. I am opposed to the Jadwin request that the Chief of Engineers administer the flood-control program as a sovereign dictator. This is exactly what he would have done. He says:

The Army Engineer flood-control plan contemplates that the project be administered by the Chief of Engineers, with the Mississippi River Commission working under him in an advisory capacity.

He then says this in support of his request that would make the Chief of Engineers a virtual Mussolini:

How many commissions ever administered a job with efficiency? The United States Government has a single head, with advisors. So do the various departments of the Government. Every corporation is administered by a single head.

The general is evidently unmindful of a very familiar portion of the Constitution of the United States when he says that this Government is administered "by a single head with advisors." I suggest that he read again the Constitution that very plainly creates a governmental triumvirate composed of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches. The Congress of the United States is not the "advisor" of the President; neither is that the function of the judicial branch of the Government.

I do not think that General Jadwin is so personally ambitious that he desires to go down in history with the fame of General Goethals, and I do not think that his request for the powers of a Mussolini for the Chief of Engineers in regard to flood control is a personal desire, because his four-year tour of duty as Chief of Engineers will be ended by operation of the Manchu law or by retirement before any plan can get well under operation.

But I do think that his suggestion is unworthy of serious consideration. The administration of this program rightly belongs in the hands of a commission of engineers and economists; its personnel should include civil engineers with Mississippi River experience in equal number and with equal rank and power with the Army engineers; and one or two practical business men from the Mississippi Valley, who have first-hand and lengthy contact with the river problem, should have a place thereon.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to suggest to the gentleman that in all these projects submitted the Chief of Engineers for his examination reports—I think on every occasion they have put in an estimate as to the cost of this project—how much money it is going to take. In justice to General Jadwin I do not think he meant to go out of his way, but thought evidently it was a part of his duty in passing judgment on it to suggest the cost.

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. I am not impugning his motive, but I still maintain that it is not his nor any other engineer's duty to recommend to Congress whether the Government shall bear the whole expense or the locality a part of the expense.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It has been done.

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Yes. Murder has been committed, but a second murder does not make the first one right.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But the gentleman is arguing that it was wrong; I do not agree that it was wrong.

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. I am not complaining of his right to give an estimate of the cost, but of his division of responsibility betwen the Government and the locality.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman does not think that the locality should ever contribute to the project?

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Not when it is a matter that affects the general welfare of the people of the United States; no, sir.

ENGINEER JADWIN NOT INFALLIBLE

Lest too much faith be placed by laymen in the words and plans of an engineer, especially one of the prominence, by virtue of his rank and assignment, as Edgar Jadwin, I want to read a statement made by a gentleman of the valley who is not an engineer, but who is an unquestioned authority upon the Mississippi River problem, and who explodes with fact one of Jadwin's pet suggestions.

I quote from the brief submitted to the Flood Control Committee by Hon. Oscar Johnston, discussing the plan of the Army engineers:

Not being a civil engineer, I shall not presume to criticize the engineering plans submitted by the general, other than in a single particular, namely, the matter of "fuze-plug levees."

The plan provides for a fuze-plug levee at Cypress Creek. The idea of the plan is that at a given height in the water this "fuze plug" will blow out, break, or be overflowed, permitting the escape of a given quantity of water; the maximum of this quantity is stated in the plan at 900,000 cubic feet per second. The greatest crevasse, I believe, that has ever occurred in the Mississippi Levee was the break at Mounds Landing, when the water stood approximately 19 feet above the level of the ground. This break was a half-mile in width. The water swept through with an unprecedented velocity, and yet it is only estimated that the flow through this crevasse was approximately 500,000 cubic feet per second. This crevasse washed out a lake or "blue hole" more than 100 feet deep and cut a channel more than a mile back into the interior, destroying 5,000 acres of land by depositing sand of such character as to prevent successful cultivation of the soil in the future. If such a result happens at one of the fuze plugs, it would be almost an impossible task to restore the levee without looping or building back for some distance. A few successive breaks of this sort at the same point would shortly result in a channel being cut from the head to the mouth of the spillway.

Those of us who have lived behind levees the greater part of our lives are decidedly of the opinion that levees have a perverse way of not breaking at points where they are expected to break. Frequently water is impounded and raised temporarily as the result of a windstorm; frequently windstorms bring about waves that wash into and cut through a strong levee standing several feet above the crest of the water; frequently levees are undermined by water seeping through below the base.

We believe from practical experience, as opposed to engineering theory, that such spillways as are constructed should be of the type commonly known as "controlled," or should be left open at the head and leveed along the sides so that the flow of water through the spillways may be controlled and regulated.

$296,400,000 OR $750,000,000?

The Army Engineer report, recommended in toto by President Coolidge, says "the total cost of the recommended project is $296,400,000."

The President, transmitting this report saying that the Government "may even bear 80 per cent of such costs," infers that 20 per cent, or $59,280,000, would be all, therefore, that the local areas would have to pay.

But the engineer plan very plainly omits an estimate for drainage, costs of flowage rights, and rights of way for flood control.

The Mississippi River Commission submitted the figure of $775,000,000 as its best estimate of the cost of a comprehensive flood-control plan. Now, 20 per cent of this would be $155,000,000—and that is a far cry from the figure of $29,280,000 as would be indicated by the Army engineer estimate.

Let us not be misled, nor try to mislead, in handling this situation. We people of the Mississippi Valley are ready and willing to open our books to you, without a page concealed; and in return we ask that the agencies of this Government charged with recommending a plan for congressional action deal with us fairly, frankly, and aboveboard.

THE PLEDGE OF THE CONSTITUTION

The preamble to the Constitution of the United States, augmented by section 8 of Article I thereof, pledges the aid of this Government to such a situation as arose when the flood of 1927 threatened the general welfare of the people of this country.

This pledge was made in the very beginning of the political sovereignty of this country; and when a situation arises that requires a pledge to be fulfilled, the fulfillment thereof becomes a solemn duty.

It is, therefore, the solemn duty of this Government, in keeping faith with its Constitution and its people, to assume the responsibility now and hereafter for protection of the lives and property of the people of the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.]

To say that the Government will assume "part responsibility" is to shirk a duty. To impose upon an innocent people any portion of this financial responsibility is to evade a solemn pledge. In such a national disaster as that of the Mississippi flood of 1927, the absolute responsibility for further prevention lies wholly and unqualifiedly upon the National Government.

To bring this tragedy under the provisions of the so-called general-welfare clause of the Constitution is no task at all. It comes under the constitutional guaranty, because the lives of American citizens are in constant hazard under the present situation.

No people can live with any feeling of security and build real American homes while facing probable disaster—

Said the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Hoover made the statement that to permit one and one-half millions of people to live under such a continuous hazard from year to year is unthinkable.

IN OPPOSITION TO LOCAL CONTRIBUTIONS

The Mississippi River is the Nation's stream—

Said Hon. Le Roy Percy, former United States Senator from Mississippi, and prominent for many years in flood-control work.

The Nation at its expense should construct and maintain levees and other means of flood protection.

Chairman FRANK REID, of the House Flood Control Committee, made this statement:

The people of the Mississippi Valley have already been bled white in paying the bill of the Nation's drainage. It is unthinkable that any student of our Government will assume that the United States, in the discharge of the purely national governmental function of protecting the lives and property of its citizens from destructive flood waters of navigable rivers and promoting the interstate commerce of this Nation, should demand of local communities a part payment of the cost.

Hon. L. O. Crosby, president of the Mississippi State Board of Development and personal representative of Governor Bilbo at the hearings, made this statement:

When you gentlemen of the committee have ascertained the facts and the real conditions that exist in the flooded area, I have no hesitancy in believing what the people of my State believe—that you will recognize it as a national problem, and we will have action along those lines.

Hon. A. H. Stone, of Washington County, Miss., made this succinct statement in the course of his valuable testimony before the committee:

It is a national proposition, and it always has been national in its scope.

Hear the words of a man who has seen the maximum local effort and money go to nought in the face of this herculean problem:

The situation is becoming more and more tense until this lower country, which is as fine a country as there is in the world, by degrees you may say is going to destruction.

That is from the testimony of A. M. Pepper, representing the Yazoo-Mississippi Delta Board, a man who has spent the greater part of the 27 years of his life face to face with this threat of destruction; and who realizes, as do others, that this is no longer a task for anyone save the Government itself.

AVOID A "KILKENNY-CAT FIGHT"

Hon. Walter Sillers, sr., of Rosedale, Miss., who represented the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners and who began his fight against this problem in 1882, knows that if this Government refuses to take full charge of the problem now that the result will be, as expressed in his testimony before the committee—

A Kilkenny-cat fight, in which only a few districts will survive.

The waters of many States pouring into the Mississippi overcharge the stream to the extent that it makes it impossible for the few States in the lower reaches to handle the situation, and the control of the flood waters becomes a national problem—

He said.

Two principles laid down by the Mississippi Department of the American Legion when it held its annual meeting in Greenville before the waters had receded from that stricken city, are worthy of remembrance. Capt. W. T. Wynn, who represented that organization in the hearings at Washington, put them in the record, as follows:

First. That the control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River is a national problem, and the sole responsibility should be vested in the National Government.

Second. That the matter of flood control should not be interfered with by political differences; it is a matter beyond party lines or the now mythical sectional border, and no halfway measure should be tried.

The immensity and national importance of the question is sounded in a section of the testimony of Mr. Alexander Fitzhugh, a prominent business man of Vicksburg, Miss., when he told the committee:

We believe a careful estimate of the situation would justify the statement that the control of the floods of the Mississippi River is equally as important to the business of the country as the construction of the Panama Canal, and surely the moral obligations resting upon Congress to protect the people of the flooded section is more binding.

DILEMMA OF THE TAXPAYERS

Mr. J. S. Allen, chief engineer of the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, a man of long experience and high standing in his profession, gave valuable testimony at Vicksburg when hearings were held by the Mississippi River Commission at the suggestion of the War Department.

What he said I want you to hear—and I quote this important paragraph from his testimony:

My board is heartily in favor of the Government taking over these levees. We realize that our taxpayers have come to the end of the road.

In fact, I make this statement here in all sincerity: That if the Nation can not see a way to turn this over to the Corps of Engineers in toto I think it is time for the local taxpayers to get out of the valley entirely. That statement has been made by able lawyers and business men not only in my territory but from several territories, and they make it from their hearts. I am convinced that they have gone as far as they can.

The report of the commission for 1925 shows that the local taxpayers put up $154,000,000 for levees alone since 1882 and the Federal Government put up $63,000,000; or, in other words, 71 per cent by the local districts and 29 per cent by the United States.

It has become too heavy and it is up to you, as I can see it, to make the valley safe absolutely—build so big that there will be no question of failure.

DEPTH OF FINANCIAL ABILITY SOUNDED

The levee boards have a bonded indebtedness to-day that passes the $40,000,000 mark. They have sounded the depth of their financial ability.

The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker and Members of Congress, that the levee boards have reached that condition frequently reached by the individual—financial embarassment.

Their bonds are no longer sought in the financial mart. Listen to this warning from William R. Humphrey, representing the Compton Investment Co. and the Mississippi Valley Group of Investment Bankers Association:

I have been asked to come before you to discuss the question of whether levee districts can float bonds at satisfactory prices on the present market to pay a portion of the cost of flood-control works.

I have given a good deal of thought to this question; and the answer is, no; they can not.

The question immediately arises, why can not these bonds be marketed? The answer to that is that there have already been too many defaults in the payment of special assessment bonds. The good market which they enjoyed two or three years ago is not in existence now.

The investment bankers have found for some time that they can not sell drainage and levee bonds.

Now, many breaks in the levee in the 1927 flood occurred simply because the local people were financially unable to cope against the problem. Definite citations of this condition were made in the testimony of Hon. Oscar Johnston when he said:

Two of the breaks that happened in Arkansas this past year happened because of the inability of local contribution. I have reference to the break at Knowlton and another at Laconia Landing. Both of those levees were known to be below grade and unsound and insecure, and it was known two years or more before the flood to every engineer on the river that they would not withstand a flood. The Mississippi River Commission went in and offered to do the work under the prevailing rule—one-third contribution by the local district, two-thirds by the Mississippi River Commission—and the two little districts, almost poverty stricken and bonded, answered: "We are unable to furnish our one-third." The Mississippi River Commission made the only answer that it could make: "We can not under the law give you any aid," and the two levees were left down. The water that poured out of the west bank of the Mississippi River at Knowlton and Laconia demonstrated and emphasized the fallacy of requiring local contributions, wherein one little local district can sit back and say: "We can not contribute," and a crevasse may happen there that will overflow the whole district and make worthless all the work that has been done.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE PRESS

Editorial opinion that flood control is a national responsibility is not confined to the press of the Mississippi Valley. I am glad to note that leading newspapers all over the United States have analyzed the situation and have come out in vigorous editorial expression for a governmental assumption of the entire responsibility.

In this connection I quote two paragraphs from an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post a few days ago:

That the United States must undertake this gigantic work and pay for it is a foregone conclusion. The difficulties in the way of apportioning part of the cost to the lower Mississippi States are insuperable. No method can be found for justly apportioning their share of the cost. No State has the right to expend money for enterprises outside of its boundaries. But beyond these difficulties arises the outstanding fact that the lower Mississippi States are not responsible for the floods and should not be taxed to control them.

The Mississippi River is a national stream, draining many States and benefiting or damaging the American people, as the case may be, without regard to State lines.

The lower States have already taxed themselves for scores of millions for local protection, only to be overwhelmed last year as if they had not spent a dollar. They can not control the river.

If this Nation is in duty bound to pay for any part of flood-control work, it is bound to pay for all of it. The river is not the property of any State or groups of States. It is the property of the United States, and the owner is responsible for the damage done by his property.

PROTECTION IS THE ISSUE

The issue before this Congress for action is whether the Federal Government, as the guarantor of the welfare of its people, shall place into operation the machinery necessary to carry out this guarantee, and to do so at its own expense; or whether it will simply assume a part of the responsibility for this complete guarantee, and demand a pound of flesh from the already suffering valley.

In the words of Hon. J. W. Cutrer, of Clarksdale, Miss., vice president of the Mississippi River Flood Control Association and a brilliant authority upon flood control legislation:

The issue is one of extended security, happiness, and prosperity, or a recurrence of disasters until annihilation must result.

Even in Wall Street, where money is the god of the bankers, and where the soundness of their financial operations determines the ratio of success, the feeling is current that the financial responsibility for the full flood control program belongs upon the Government of the United States. This is indicated in the testimony of C. H. Markham, chairman of the board of the directors of the Illinois Central Railroad, who said that he had had conferences with New York business men and—those who understand it [that is, the flood control problem] are of one voice in declaring that this is a national proposition, and ought to be handled by the National Government.

HOW THE PEOPLE SUFFERED

The true story of how the people of the Mississippi Valley suffered in 1927 can never be told nor pictured in words and figures. A master realist, struggling with the task to picture in words the 1927 tragedy, would have to confine himself to his own observations and the stories that came from others. It was too vast for the observaton of one man.

Those who were there and those who were spared the tragedy, but who sympathized with the people of the valley, know that the tragedy can not be reduced to a statement of dollars and cents involved.

Yet tables of losses will convey some idea of the magnitude of the tragedy, and I want to read to you the figures for the 20 counties in my own State that suffered the ravages of the flood:

THIS IS THE TIME FOR ACTION

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Seventieth Congress, this is the time for action. Upon this session of the Seventieth Congress devolves the duty of flood-control legislation that will keep the honor of this Nation as sacred and inviolate as it has been kept since the day of its birth, in every national emergency it has faced, whether at home or abroad.

We know that statutory law can not override a law of nature. But from a study of the laws of nature we know that the proper statutory law can be enacted by this Congress to curb the restless, dangerous spirit of the Mississippi in time of flood.

A law authorizing full governmental responsibility and direction, coupled with an appropriation generous enough to put this responsibility into action, will give to the people of the United States the protection of their lives, property, and general welfare that the Constitution guarantees.

A repetition of the 1927 flood is not impossible, even so soon as next year. There is no time to be lost. The burden of action must not be shifted to another session of this Congress. We must, before we adjourn this session, keep faith with our people and our Constitution.

Let every Member of this body who has a head to think and a heart to feel enlist in this great movement to save and preserve, not only the property, but the lives of our fellow citizens.

The prayer and the hope of the people of the Mississippi Valley is that the high mark of 1927 will never be passed; but unless this mammoth problem is given immediate financial and engineering attention, the threat of an even greater disaster than that of 1927 lies like a shadow across the valley. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, on the 1st of February, 1924, I introduced a bill to amend the Judicial Code which would have taken from the United States district courts jurisdiction, in the first instance, to set aside an order or regulation imposed upon a public-utility corporation by a State commission. I introduced that bill in the Sixty-ninth Congress and also in this Congress on the 5th of December, 1927. It is H. R. 95. Originally a similar bill had been introduced by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

My bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no district or circuit court of the United States or judge thereof shall have jurisdiction to entertain any bill of complaint to suspend or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order made by an administrative board or commission in any State, acting under and pursuant to the statutes of such State, where such order was made after hearing upon notice, nor to entertain jurisdiction of any bill of complaint to suspend or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of the statute under which such order was made in any case where under the statutes of that State provision is made for a judicial review of such order upon the law and the facts: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall limit or affect in any manner the jurisdiction of district and circuit courts of the United States and the judges thereof in matters affecting interstate commerce, nor to prohibit such court or courts or the judges thereof from entertaining any bill of complaint to suspend or restrain the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order made by an administrative board or commission in any State in so far as such order affects interstate commerce.

The purpose of the bill is clear. It simply takes from the United States district court jurisdiction to hear in the first instance cases of public-utility corporations engaged solely in intrastate operations, created by the State in which it operates, subject to the rules and regulations of State commissions or boards, when such corporations seek to avoid obeying an order or rule of a State board or commission. When a public-utility corporation seeks a franchise or enters into a contract with a city to furnish service and agrees on rates and service requirements in order to obtain a franchise, surely it should be expected that it will comply with the terms of the franchise or contract and that should there be any question or difference it would be left to the State courts to decide. The State court is in a better position to understand all of the facts. It is in a better position to understand and know the intent and purpose of the State laws. It is the business of the State court to pass on these questions. Yet the custom has grown for public-utility companies seeking to avoid solemn obligations contained in franchises or contracts voluntarily entered into by them to get away from their own courts, where the facts are known and often where the character and habits of the individuals operating public-utility companies are known, and to resort to a Federal court and there so confuse the issues that the real original issue is lost and, by avoiding the State courts, often obtain advantages utterly unfair to the public and often obtain the authority to disregard rules and terms ordered by the duly authorized State board or commission having sole jurisdiction over public-utility corporations. Not only in New York has this practice developed but in many of the large cities throughout the United States. The mere fact that this practice has grown to such an extent justifies Congress giving the subject some consideration.

At this very moment in New York City we have just such a situation. As everyone knows, we have extensive subway lines, elevated lines furnishing rapid-transit facilities to the 6,000,000 people of New York. Some of the old surface lines are operating under franchises giving them the exclusive rights to furnish transportation on certain streets. The subway lines are operating under a contract entered into between the operating companies and the city of New York. They now seek to avoid certain terms which they solemnly agreed to and are running to the Federal courts to be protected in their attempt to avoid an obligation and in their plans to disregard the order of our transit commission, which corresponds to the public-utility commission in some of your States.

This is not the first time that New York City has been defeated of its rights by a public-service corporation. Imagine a city of 6,000,000 population entering into an agreement with an operating company, seeking to protect its citizens, making every safeguard possible, maintaining State courts, to find itself deprived of every safeguard that it took, to find itself instead of being the master of the situation in the protection of its 6,000,000 people—I say, to find itself at the mercy of these powerful corporations, who somehow manage to get the Federal courts to stand back of them. New York City had the experience with the gas company case. In that instance the legislature, in accordance with the franchises given to the gas company, fixed the price of gas. The rate was a fair and reasonable rate and was fixed after a great deal of investigation and study. No sooner was the law put into effect than the gas companies ran to the Federal court and got a temporary injunction restraining every State, county, and city official from enforcing the law of the State. The result of that case has done more to make people lose confidence in the Federal court than anything that has happened in a long time. The method of procedure, the partiality, the indifference to the rights of the people of New York, and the clumsy, apparent action of the court and master will be remembered as a miscarriage of justice for many years to come. The court appointed a master in that case. The master happened to have been a very close associate of the judge at one time. The master handed down a decision in favor of the gas company. Oh, yes; it will be said the case went on appeal and was affirmed. That is true. What appellate court can closely examine tens of thousands of pages of testimony? What appellate court can scrutinize volumes—literally volumes of expert testimony and volumes of accountants' reports? Of course, the issues were so confused, the testimony so voluminous, that the appellate courts naturally had only questions of law to pass upon and could not have reviewed such a bulky case that the master took almost a year to hear. Every Member of this House will remember that only a few days ago the Supreme Court of the United States ordered the master to make restitution of part of the excessive fee paid to him by the gas companies. When the matter of the fees came up the city of New York protested that the fees paid to the master were exorbitant and out of all proportion to any known standard for services of the kind; the gas companies and the master replied that it was none of the city's business that they paid the fee to the master willingly and were very happy to pay such a good master such good fees. What a misnomer the word master was in that case. Of course, the gas companies were willing to pay. Why should not they be? Do you wonder, gentlemen, that some of us are stirred to protest, and that we become indignant when we witness—not only witness but are the victims of such flagrant misuse of the Federal courts?

To get back to the case now in the Federal court, the traction companies entered into a contract with the city of New York to furnish rapid-transit service. The city of New York, in consideration of the service to be rendered, built the subways. The subways of New York are property of the city of New York. The city of New York has invested in subway construction over $400,000,000. Among other things, the traction companies agreed to furnish service for a 5-cent fare. No longer was the ink dry on the contract, after several ups and downs of the stock of the companies, each up and down resulting in huge hauls for the gamblers and stock manipulators who control the companies and who seemingly know more about the stock ticker than they do about operating trains, demands were made for increased fare. It is well to point out that just about the time the so-called dual contracts were entered into by the city of New York there was quite a movement in the United States for municipal-operated transit service. In fact, some of the Ohio cities had been so successful that fares had been reduced down to 3 cents. The New York traction companies, sensing that the reduction of fares below 5 cents might become contagious, not only insisted in putting in the 5-cent fare, but made the 5-cent-fare provision as definite, binding, and unalterable as all the legal talent that the traction company could muster could make it.

Even during my time down at city hall as president of the board of aldermen these traction companies made an attempt to increase the fare then. I sat at the hearings through many weeks. I had the opportunity to study and learn the entire history and background of these companies. I got their figures, methods of operation, and learned of their past and present mistakes. Naturally their application before the board of estimate and apportionment was denied. They then went to the State legislature and sought to have a made-to-order law enacted which would provide the means for an increased fare. I was still at city hall and I opposed that law with all the force and strength that was in me. It was the most brazen attempt on the part of a governor to give absolute power to a traction company, ignoring the rights of the city and 6,000,000 people, that was ever attempted by any executive. This same governor is now one of the chief lawyers for one of the traction companies. The protest of the public was so strong that soon the law was modified and even this effort failed. Omitting many of the intervening incidents and attempts of the traction companies to get an increased fare, we come to the last desperate effort, which brings us to the necessity for the serious consideration of my bill. A few weeks ago the traction companies served notice that on a certain day in March the fare would be 7 cents instead of 5 cents. That their plans were well made in advance, that they knew just where they could get an order for temporary injunction seems very likely, for the traction companies have announced that they have already purchased the coin turnstiles to receive the additional fares.

This notice came in the midst of hearings being held before our transit commission, and, as I said, were apparently made in the course of a well-prepared plan of action. While the transit commission was seeking to prevent any increased fare, while it had ordered the traction companies to continue service in accordance with the terms of the contract and the law, while the city officials were preparing papers to enjoin in the State courts the companies from disregarding their obligations and the law, lo and behold, an order is obtained from a Federal judge, signed at his home, based on several pages of affidavits, all of which were printed and not typewritten, and this order enjoins and restrains not only the transit commission from interfering, but also the courts of the State of New York. True, it was an order to show cause only. But it was an order to show cause which contained the injunctions I have described. At this very moment the State and municipal authorities are stayed from taking any action to protect their rights. The order now comes up for consideration. The judge who has it in his hands now has in his keeping the restoration of confidence in the Federal court. He can, by denying the injunction the traction companies seek, uphold the dignity of the Federal court and win the respect for it of millions and millions of country-loving, law-abiding, decent American men and women. If any constitutional rights of these traction companies are invaded by the State transit commission or even by the State courts, then, but then only, can the traction companies resort to the highest court in the land, the United States Supreme Court. The traction companies created by the laws of the State of New York, doing business only in the State of New York, receiving its charter and franchise from the State of New York, having a contract with the city of New York, all within the State of New York, must abide by the law of the State of New York as construed and interpreted by the courts of that State. If the courts of the State err or mistake, and through their mistake and error deprive the companies of any constitutional right the traction companies are by no means without remedy, for, as I have said, they then have recourse to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was never intended that the United States district court should be the court of first instance in such a case. The sum and substance of the application of the traction companies proceeding in the Federal court is to obtain an increased fare, a matter entirely under the jurisdiction of the State courts, and the parties to the contract both citizens of the State of New York. It involves no other question, yet the reading of the papers and the argument for an injunction leaves the fare question bound in a maze of technicalities surrounding the subject of Federal and State jurisdiction. That is just what the traction companies are seeking to do. It wants to get away from the real facts, it wants to get away from the merits of the case, it wants to confuse the issues, it wants to create the question of jurisdiction, and who knows perhaps they too can succeed in avoiding obedience to State law and fulfillment of the terms of their own contract.

This question of fare increase is far more important to the people of the city of New York than most people of the country can imagine. The mere 2 cents difference means a great deal to the working people of the city of New York and it also means literally millions of dollars of profits not only for the traction company, but for those individuals surrounding the traction companies who are on the "inside." Recent hearings by the transit commission has developed that the ownership of large blocks of the stock are in the hands of various groups of men not at all interested in rapid transit for the people of New York, but interested in rapid movement of the stock ticker for themselves. It can readily be seen that the increase in fare for the companies carrying several million passengers a day means several million dollars a year out of the pockets of the working men and women of New York City and into the treasury of the traction companies. It means that the issuance of an injunction by a Federal court restraining the State courts from acting, enjoining the State commission from protecting the people of the city of New York, will give such an impetus, such a push to the stock ticker as to shoot the quotation of this watered stock sky high. Then the big haul. Again the public will come in and buy and the present manipulators of this stock will dump and, without exaggeration, a hundred million dollars will be scooped in. In the meantime the people of New York City are being crowded in cars to such an unwholesome extent that the Department of Agriculture would not permit cattle or hogs to be shipped. Gentlemen, we have cause to protest, we have reasons to become indignant, we have a right to ask for legislation to prevent the misuse and the abuse of Federal courts at the expense of millions of innocent men and women.

Litigation had already been instituted in the State courts, but the representatives of the traction company sneaked to the home of a Federal judge and obtained a temporary injunction. The misuse of Federal courts to avoid obligations under contracts, to disregard orders of State commissions, and to disregard the law itself on the part of public-utility companies has grown to such an extent that it has become a national scandal. The courts are being used instead of administering justice as a delousing plant for dirty and unclean public-utility corporations and that means the traction companies of New York. I make this statement at this time to attract the attenion of municipal authorities throughout the United States that my bill pending would give them the protection that every community in the United States must have and that pressure should be brought to bear to limit by legislation the power of the Federal courts and to take from it the jurisdiction that is now being used for the purpose of legalizing the exploitation of these greedy corporations.

It was never intended that United States district courts should intervene in the first nistance to permit public-utility companies disregarding law or obligations under contracts. The custom now has become so general, the power of traction and other public-utility companies so great, the exploitation of the people so ruthless that Congress must step in and curb this evil.

We do not seek to take from these companies the right to resort to a Federal court or to the Supreme Court on a constitutional question; but when they enter into a contract with a municipality or with a State or a county to obtain a franchise they should first resort to the State courts, and then after exhausting every remedy in the State courts, if a constitutional question is involved, in accordance with the provision of the Constitution, they will then have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but not until then.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. In this New York situation they have gone so far as to try to prevent the municipality and the State from using the State courts to try out the question.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Exactly—an unheard-off proceeding. It brings confusion into the matter. It beclouds the entire issue. It puts the Federal court in an extremely difficult and delicate position. That was never intended in the creation of the Judicial Code. I hope that this case in New York, notwithstanding all that we may have to suffer, will at least serve to bring the matter to the attention of other municipalities, and that Congress will act on these necessary measures. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I introduced yesterday H. Res. 121, authorizing and directing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to investigate why an appointment had not been made for the position of rural carrier on rural route No. 3, out of Westville, Adair County, Okla.

Both of the political parties in their platforms state that they are in favor of civil-service reform. Reading from the Republican platform of 1924, I find the following on civil service:

> The improvement in the enforcement of the merit system both by legislative enactment and executive action since March 4, 1921, has been marked and effective. By Executive order the appointment of presidential postmasters has been placed on the merit basis, similar to that applying to the classified service. We favor the classification of postmasters in first, second, and third class offices, and the placing of the prohibition-enforcement field clerk within the classified service without necessarily incorporating all the present personnel.

Rural route carriers are presumably in the classified service. When a vacancy occurs and there is no eligible list, an examination is called for. This was what was done when a vacancy occurred on rural route No. 3 out of Westville, Adair County, Okla. An examination was held last summer. A list of eligibles was certified by the Civil Service Commission to the Post Office Department on the 25th day of October last, nearly four months ago.

I have made repeated inquiries of the rural route division of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office time after time, trying to get some expression as to why a carrier had not been appointed. You can get no satisfactory answer. A personal call yields no better result. They simply say that they are making some sort of an investigation.

Now, as a part of my remarks I want to place in the RECORD a very short letter which I have written upon this subject:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1928.

Hon. H. H. BILLANY,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,
Post Office Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BILLANY: In reply to your letter of January 28, my information is that a list of eligibles was certified on October 25, 1927. That is now more than three months ago. I hesitate to introduce a resolution upon this subject. However, the patrons there at Westville have brought it to my attention so frequently that I feel constrained to take some action unless an appointment is made in the near future. Of course, if the Post Office Department has any real excuse, that is not indicated in your reply. I think I have a right to insist that a permanent carrier be appointed within a reasonable time from a list of eligibles certified. A full list of three was certified and I think the patrons of the office have a right to have me insist upon some action being taken.

I have hesitated to press the matter until a full opportunity could be had to make the inquiry relative to those whose names appear upon the list. To be absolutely frank with you, it has been indicated to me that an effort has been made to disqualify some one on this list in order that a new list may be certified because of the fact that the name of no Republican appears upon the list. Your reply does not indicate this.

I submit that the Representative of that district is entitled to know why an appointment has not been made.

Sincerely yours,

W. W. HASTINGS.

I have introduced this resolution for an investigation, and it has been referred to the Committee on Rules under the rules of the House. I suppose, of course, that it will there sleep the sleep that knows no waking; but I am determined, Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, that we shall have some sort of an expression from the Post Office Department as to why a rural mail carrier, after a list of eligibles has been certified, is not appointed after four months.

Now, the honest truth about it is that all three of the eligibles happen to be of the opposite political party. They are juggling with the list in the hope that some one on the list can be disqualified and a new list of eligibles called. At present a temporary carrier is appointed by the postmaster, his son; and he, of course, is of his political faith, and can not hold longer after a permanent appointment is made. That is the real answer to it, and that is the real reason why an appointment has not been made.

I just wanted to take this time of the House to show to the House and to the country that the administration's profession of being in favor of civil service is all bunk.

On April 27, 1926, I took occasion to attempt to expose the hypocrisy of the Post Office Department with reference to the civil service. I stated then that the present administration was the most partisan one I had ever experienced. I quoted extensively from the criticisms of Congressman WURZBACH, of Texas, when he preferred openly the following charge against the Postmaster General and said:

> It is a spoils system pure and simple, without one redeeming quality. The ordinary spoilsman buys influence with his own money. Under the system I am attacking influence is bought with public office.

And again he said:

> The power and influence of these patronage politicians in Washington is simply amazing and almost incredible. This is true especially with regard to the Postmaster General and his first assistant.

And he might well have added "the rural route division of the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General."

Congressman WILSON of Mississippi, on March 22, 1926, stated—> and yet in my State of Mississippi for months some of the most reputable citizens of that great Commonwealth have charged, without fear of successful contradiction, that post offices in the State were sold in the open market, and that the buying and selling of Federal offices in Mississippi is a common practice.

Again, in the same speech, Congressman WILSON asserted:

> And in my State to-day there exists a condition which has no parallel in the history of the Southland since the dark days that followed the Civil War. Not only are Federal positions sold in the open market to the highest bidders but the control of Federal patronage is almost entirely in the hands of the negroes. God save my country from the sad day when negroes are placed in the seats of the mighty and political control passes into their black hands.

Congressman WURZBACH also asserted in the same speech referred to:

> It has passed beyond that stage, however, and has grown into a national scandal.

I called attention then to the violations of the civil service law and asserted that the civil service was not enforced in the State of Oklahoma.

The Republican Convention will meet again on June 12 at Kansas City and will reassert that it is in favor of the civil service.

O face, where is thy shame?

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and outside of the few general remarks that I shall make with reference to this bill, that will conclude the general debate on our side of the aisle. I yield myself 15 minutes of my remaining time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say with reference to the bill now before us for consideration and action that the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on the fiscal relations of the District of Columbia has devoted a great deal of time to a study of the different items in the bill and the many requests placed before the subcommittee that were not included in the bill. After the very able and intelligent presentation on the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the subcommittee, I feel that it is unnecessary for me to add anything to what he so well stated the other day.

Speaking generally, I may say that I was agreeably surprised this being my first investigation into District affairs, as a member of the subcommittee, at the able manner in which the affairs of the District were presented to the subcommittee during the hearings by those in charge of District affairs. I agree with the statement made by my colleagues on the committee that the affairs of the District of Columbia are being very ably taken care of. I want to say, however, for the benefit of the few who appeared before our subcommittee who seemed to believe that by hedging and refusing to give direct information in response to questions propounded by the members of the subcommittee, that they would strengthen their case a great deal if they would change their tactics. Those persons at the head of the several departments of the District government are supposed to be intelligent men who understand the English language, and when they refuse to give a straightforward reply to a straightforward question propounded by the subcommittee they might just as well understand that they are not fooling the subcommittee, but are prejudicing their own case. This applies to only one or two of those appearing.

I may also say for the benefit of the RECORD and for the benefit of the Members of the House that it is said by those who have had longer experience on the subcommittee than I have had that the subcommittee in investigating into the affairs of the District of Columbia this year gave the District officials and the school authorities the widest latitude to present their cases that they have ever had before any subcommittee of the House on the affairs of the District of Columbia. This statement is borne out by the fact that the hearings held this year by the subcommittee exceed by 500 pages the amount of testimony taken by any other subcommittee on District affairs. That indicates, I believe, that the committee wanted to be fair and just to all concerned, and wanted to give every person appearing before the committee unlimited time to explain their case in their own way, so that we might get all the facts bearing on the questions before us in order that we might reach a just decision with reference to their contentions.

I just want to say a word with reference to a few of the items in the bill regarding the salaries of employees of the District of Columbia. Much has been said about this item. Some have intimated that the committee was requested or influenced by certain interested parties to go into this matter and bring in a recommendation on this matter. I think I am safe in saying that there was not an employee of the District or the representative of an employee or any employees' organization that took this matter up with the committee. The committee made investigation into this question themselves. When we came to the item in the bill submitted to us from the Bureau of the Budget it carried only $37,000 for step-ups, promotions recommended by the Bureau of Efficiency. We inquired into this, and after investigating it very thoroughly we discovered that instead of $37,000 being sufficient to grant the necessary increases in wages for those recommended for promotion by the Bureau of Efficiency, it took $340,750 to bring these poorly paid District employees up to the average of their grade. There has always been a differential between the Federal employee's salary and the salary of employees of the District of Columbia doing like work. The subcommittee thought and had a right to believe that with the passage of the reclassification act, which provides for equal pay for equal service, that unfair condition was eliminated. But to our great surprise we discovered that that differential was still in existence. After the committee went into this matter very thoroughly and after it had been referred to the clerks of the committee and after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], it was decided that something should be done with reference to these salaries.

But instead of writing into this bill the amount of $340,750 which would be necessary under the reclassification act, the subcommittee decided to make a two-year program of it and cut this item in two. So that in the bill now before us half of that amount is carried, and in the next bill, when it appears before the House, it is anticipated that the balance of this amount will be carried in order to bring these poor underpaid employees of the District of Columbia up to a level with the other employees of the Federal Government doing similar work.

May I state further, Mr. Chairman, that the committee impressed upon the chairman of the personnel board, and all of those who will have anything to do with the allocation of the amount of money written into this bill for increases of salary, that none of it is to be allocated to the employees who are now receiving salaries above the average of their grades; that it must all be allocated to those who are at the minimum of their grades in order to bring those people up where they rightfully belong. If there is any question of doubt between two employees that doubt is to be resolved in favor of the person in the lower grade. So it is an honest attempt to try to do the right thing by the people who have been deprived of what they believe and we believe they should have received some time ago.

It is my opinion that this is going to be very beneficial in the administration of the affairs of the District of Columbia. I could cite many illustrations, but will take one for example, the engineering department, of which Captain Whitehurst is the superintendent. He told us, and the record will show, that under the provisions of the reclassification act and upon the recommendations of the Bureau of Efficiency, 72 employees in his department were entitled to promotion because of their efficiency, but under the $37,000 carried in the bill that came to us from the Bureau of the Budget only 7 employees could be given the necessary promotion. It may have been 7 or 10. I do not recall exactly what the number was.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Another marked place is in the sewer department where the amount allowed for step-ups was less than $600.

Mr. CASEY. You can readily see what effect that kind of a system would have upon the employees. Here are 72 employees who because of their efficiency were recommended for promotion and increases in salary by the Bureau of Efficiency, but because of a lack of funds the head of the department was compelled to pick out 7 of the 72 and grant the 7 increases in salary, while the rest were denied the increases they were rightly entitled to. Of course, that would bring about chaos in any organization and much dissatisfaction among the employees, because they were not getting what rightfully belonged to them. Then the charge of favoritism would be made against the head of the division or department, and that would not be for the best interests of the department.

The chairman of the subcommittee has suggested the amount allocated or provided for the employees of the sewer department. I would like to have the time to go into that situation; but I am not going to detain the committee from getting into a reading of the bill. However, I will briefly state this to the members of the committee: The testimony shows that the sewer department has not had an additional employee for about 20 years, with the result that there are certain parts of the District of Columbia, one subdivision in particular, where there is not a sewer or a water pipe, and in that section there are about 40,000 human beings living under those conditions. There are several wells in that section but most of them have been condemned by the bureau of health because of contamination from the seepage of the outhouses. It is a deplorable situation and it should be rectified at the earliest date possible.

In connection with the sewerage system I may also say that Rock Creek, which runs through beautiful Rock Creek Park, which we all visit at least occasionally, to which we are pleased to take our friends and where thousands and tens of thousands of men, women, and children go on Saturday afternoons and Sunday afternoons during the summer, as disclosed in the hearings, is an open sewer and that the sewage of that section is running through Rock Creek Park. That condition should be discontinued at once. I would like to see this bill carry an additional $1,000,000 for the installation of a proper sewerage system and the laying of water pipes in those sections where the poorer class of people live, and I would like to see sufficient money included in some bill to correct the condition I just referred to in Rock Creek Park. A condition of this kind should have no place in any community, let alone a community of this kind, the Capital of the Nation. I hope something will be done to correct it.

I may also say that I believe several of the bureaus of the District need reorganization and need it very badly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes. Of course, our committee has not the right, under the rules of the House, to bring in legislation on this bill. The necessary legislation should be placed before the House by the legislative committee of the House. I will take, for illustration, the bureau of plumbing and inspection. They have, I think, the poorest system of plumbing and the poorest system of inspection there is in any city of its size in the country. They have the old and antiquated idea of inspection and tests that were discarded by every up-to-date city or town 50 years ago, but we still continue those old ideas in the District of Columbia. The health of the people of the District should have some consideration.

Then take the electrical bureau. In this bureau they collect a fee for a permit to install electrical wires and apparatus, but they never inspect any of the work done under the authority of those permits unless the owner requests that an inspection be made, with the result that we had on the books of the electrical bureau at the close of the last fiscal year 6,000 permits that were taken out by every Tom, Dick, and Harry, and no inspections made as the result of the electrical work installed in the buildings. We also have the complaint made that policemen and firemen, while on leave, are doing a great deal of this work without any license, without any experience, without any qualifications, and without any inspections. I am surprised that the fire-insurance rates are not almost prohibitive in the city of Washington under these conditions.

The question was brought up here the other day about 2,000,000 bricks being at the workhouse. It is an admitted fact that the bricks were there and that nobody knew anything about it, except the superintendent of the workhouse, who did not have the money with which to bring the bricks to Washington. He asked for $25,000, with which to recondition the barges and wharves in order that he might be able to bring those bricks to Washington, but that item was cut out by the Bureau of the Budget. The suggestion was made that arrangements be entered into for the use of the railroad that was recently put in there, but railroad freight rates are 50 per cent higher than transportation by water; the superintendent testified that these barges would more than pay for themselves in one year. So the committee disregarded the action taken by the Bureau of the Budget, and are recommending in this bill $25,000, or thereabouts, for the reconditioning of the wharves and barges, so that we may get brick from the workhouse to the wharves in Washington, that they may be used in the construction of schools, sewers, and other municipal works.

With reference to the schools, Mr. Chairman, I believe we have a wonderful system of public schools in the District of Columbia. I believe the school authorities are doing the very best they can under the circumstances to give the best kind of education it is possible to give to the children.

I am also satisfied that we are not progressing with our program of construction of elementary school buildings as rapidly as we should. There are probably many reasons for this. I have not been able to determine, but after a check-up of the municipal architect's office and all the way along the line, I have come to the conclusion that there is a little fault here and a little fault there, with the result that all of it put together makes quite an item.

The result has been that the committee has recommended an increase in the force of the municipal architect's office and changed the fee system which we hope will give the municipal architect all the employees and all the machinery and all the leeway he may need to prepare proper plans and specifications for the buildings that are authorized by Congress, so that we will not hereafter be compelled to wait 18 or 20 or 24 months from the time the appropriation is available until we have a school building in which to put the school children. We want more speed. We want more schools. Money lying around and not being used in the erection of schools does not educate children, and what we want is a speeding up of the school-building program. I think this will be the result; at least I hope so.

One of the difficulties in this respect that I want to call to the attention of the committee is this: Under the present system of authorizations for the purchase of sites for school buildings, the language, while not specifying the exact site, states at or near such and such a locality; of course, under the law the District authorities are not permitted to purchase any sites for school or other purposes at a price that exceeds 125 per cent of the assessed valuation. The record shows that in almost every case of condemnation proceedings in the courts for the acquisition of a site for a school building, the jury has rendered a verdict in excess of the 125 per cent, so we get no happiness from that source. Some different system ought to be worked out. We will need to complete our five-year building program of schools in the neighborhood of 50 or 55 additional sites, and it might be well to look into the advisability of arriving at some understanding whereby we could in some way authorize enough money to be appropriated or to be available for the authorities charged with this work, so that they would be in a position to buy, say, 25 of these sites without carrying them in each bill. I do not know whether this can be done or not, but it strikes me as being a very good suggestion. In this way nobody would know who wanted to buy the property, and we might get it a great deal cheaper than when we carry authorizations in the bill saying that a site will be purchased at or near such and such a place. If we buy a site on the outskirts of the city, and we will sooner or later be compelled to do so, we may buy it at a reasonable price and hold it for several years. Property in that section will naturally increase in value, but the property owned by the District for school purposes will also increase in value, and if the site we own is not exactly the proper location, it will be very easy to trade it for another piece of property of equal value in the same locality. I believe if we can find some solution whereby we can keep the acquisition of sites ahead of the authorized building of schools, this will do more to speed up the building program than anything I know, and the important part of this, aside from the financial arrangement, is the fact that the municipal architect contends he can not draw the plans or specifications for a school building until he knows the location and topography of the site.

He must make his plans and specifications fit the site, and this is what has been holding him back. So, as I have said, there is a little fault here and a little fault there, but I believe the school authorities are doing the very best they can, and I have nothing but praise for those officials. I think they are doing a very good job under a very difficult situation.

Something has been said here about the superintendent of schools. I do not share this criticism of the superintendent of schools. He is a perfect stranger to me. I only know him as I have seen him on the witness stand before our committee. If I have any criticism at all to make of the superintendent of schools it is because he tries to master too many of the details of the school system; matters which I think he should allocate to his subordinates, and devote his time to thinking out the greater and bigger and more important questions with respect to the education of the children of the District of Columbia. I have no criticism to offer against the actions of the superintendent of public schools. I believe in centralized authority, and I also believe in centralized responsibility, but at the same time I believe in decentralized administration.

With reference to the question of the school children on the border line of the District, I simply want to add that we went into this question very thoroughly. We had all the facts and figures before us, but nobody semed to be able to say whether or not the States of Maryland and Virginia would be able to take care of their school children at the beginning of the next school term. It is said—and with considerable justification—that we are treating them very fairly when we permit those who are now in the public school system of the District of Columbia to continue on through the grades and through the high school, a term of 12 years. Nobody can deny this. What I am interested in, however, is will the States of Virginia and Maryland be prepared to take care of the little tots who become of school age on the 1st of next September? That is the thing I am primarily interested in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASEY. I yield myself 10 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

This is a rather serious matter. We are talking now of the poorer class of people—the children of the workingmen. The fathers and mothers of these little children are making many sacrifices to give their children a proper education, while very often denying themselves many of the necessities and practically all the luxuries of life, so that they may see their children go through the elementary grades and at least through high school, and for every day we deny these children proper facilities for education we are contributing to the burden of the parents of those children.

If we have these children on half-time school schedules, we are continuing such children in school at least a year longer than they should be there, and we are, therefore, continuing this burden upon the parents of these children and depriving the children of the right of going out into the world and getting the best part of their worldly education—the education of learning how to earn a dollar and appreciate and appreciating its value and what a dollar means.

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, except to add that there are many men idle in Washington. More so than for many years. There are many men idle throughout the country. It is estimated by those who are supposed to know that there are at least 5,000,000 wage earners now unemployed.

I am afraid that we are making the same mistake that is made almost everywhere else in the country, when a depression appears on the horizon we immediately start to curtail, withdraw money from circulation and reduce the purchasing power of the great mass of the American people, the men and women who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

My idea is that instead of withdrawing money from circulation on occasions of this kind, instead of reducing the purchasing power of the great consuming masses of the country, that that is the time we should let loose the flood of money we have tied up and head off if we can the coming depression that is staring us in the face.

I would like to see the Federal Government, acting through the Appropriations Committee, start a building program; let us get into the House the bill for Mississippi flood control, also the Boulder Dam bill, the public building bill, and all other bills calling for appropriations; let us get them all passed by Congress and make the money available so that the representatives of the Government can start constructive work and put these four or five million idle men to work, if we can, and then the wheels of industry will begin to turn, the manufacturers will thrive, and we will all have the prosperity that the country is entitled to. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is closed, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, any revenue (not including the proportionate share of the United States in any revenue arising as the result of the expenditure of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1924 and prior fiscal year) now required by law to be credited to the District of Columbia and the United States in the same proportion that each contributed to the activity or source from whence such revenue was derived shall be credited wholly to the District of Columbia, and, in addition, $9,000,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be advanced July 1, 1928, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia and such advances from the Federal Treasury as are authorized in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, namely:

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures $9,000,000 on page 2, line 6, and substitute $10,000,000 in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 2, line 6, strike out the figures "$9,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman permit me to offer a substitute so that he may discuss the amendment and the substitute at the same time? I will say for the information of the gentleman that I would like to offer a substitute to strike out the $9,000,000 and insert $7,000,000, and the gentleman can discuss both propositions.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will be glad to do that, because I offer this amendment for the purpose of giving me an opportunity to express my views, which are contrary to some of the views set forth by the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Nebraska. I want to make clear that this sum which the Appropriations Committee contend is a fair contribution from the Federal Government to the expenses of the District of Columbia is not the result of a developed study or research on the part of Congress, or the committees thereof, but, I understand, was fixed upon by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who was chairman of the subcommittee some years ago. It has been adopted by the Appropriations Committee as their idea of a fair contribution.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. There is only one objection to the gentleman's figures, and that is it has been found by thorough investigation to be too generous.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. In answer to the statement made by the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, I will say that the last investigation was made by a joint committee of the House and Senate in 1912, and after seriously considering the entire matter recommended that the fiscal relationship which existed since 1878 be continued.

The distinguished gentleman from Nebraska in justifying the contribution of the Federal Government gives as a reason therefor that if the present substantive law was continued, if the contribution of the Federal Government was 40 per cent and the contribution of the District was 60 per cent, then the tax rate that is now $1.70 could be lowered to $1.25.

Mr. MADDEN. One dollar and 20 cents.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I accept the correction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. If the gentleman will give me two or three more minutes I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. That rate will raise half a million dollars more than will be needed by the District under this bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at a statement like that being made on this floor by a gentleman who has given conscientious study to the needs of the District for a number of weeks, and, perhaps, months. If the theory advanced by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] is correct, then the District is complete—we have all of the sewer mains that we will need, we have all of the water mains that we will ever need, we have all of the schools; it is a finished job, because, forsooth, if you raise the contribution of the Federal Government you would ipso facto lower the tax rate!

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. As the gentleman knows, I have not asked for any time. I have only five minutes in which to discuss this matter. If the gentleman will give me five more minutes, I shall be glad to yield. I want to call the attention of the House to the uncompleted improvements and other necessary needs of the District which could be taken care of if the Federal contribution were increased. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] a few moments ago called attention to the need of schools in the District of Columbia, that we were behind in our five-year building program.

Mr. MADDEN. And he would not have to do that if Maryland would educate its own children in its own schools.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I shall discuss that under the heading of schools.

He called attention to the crowded condition of District schools, so that there is room there for the expenditure of additional money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. As I understand the gentleman, he is predicating his position on the $9,0000,00 contribution on the ground that it has not had exhaustive study, and that therefore we do not know whether it is correct or not.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am not basing it on that. I am basing it on the fact that I do not think it is an equitable contribution on the part of the Federal Government under the system of government that obtains here as to the budget of expenditures in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CASEY. Will the gentleman give the committee the benefit of his wisdom and tell us how $10,000,000 is a just and equitable amount?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I advanced that sum in the hope that it would be given consideration at this time and in order to give myself an opportunity of presenting a few humble views on this subject.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman object to the $9,000,000 because he thinks it is too much?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; because I think it is too small.

Mr. MADDEN. We can make it a little less, if the gentleman would like it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I say to the gentlemen who are members of this committee that the program of public improvement in the District of Columbia is not complete, that it is far from complete. I say to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee and to the distinguished chairman of the committee that there are 3,431 outhouses in the District of Columbia that have not sewer connections that they can connect with, and I also say that this number, instead of decreasing, has increased more than 600 during the past five years. I also say to the gentleman that there are miles of streets in the District of Columbia that have no water mains, no water supply available, no sewer connections for the outhouses, and that the people who live in those districts and are without these improvements are the most helpless class of people in the District of Columbia and most in need of your consideration of their wants.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And I say to the gentleman further that there should be spent on sewer connections alone, in order to wipe out this condition, more than a million dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I can correct the gentleman's figures there. The engineers have figured that it will take $4,000,000 to put water and sewers throughout the District.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I said more than a million dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman insert in his remarks a statement showing how many outhouses and other insanitary conditions along the District line exist in the gentleman's district that need correction, and that the State of Maryland ought to take care of?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have not those figures as to the number, but Maryland has been making splendid progress in furnishing sewer connections to people in that section, and Maryland has been making splendid progress in her school-building program in an endeavor to keep up with the increase in population on the edges of the District.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, it is not more than a few days since the suggestion was made by one of the members of this subcommittee to some of the educators of Maryland that we would be very glad to send them some of these portable schools, but these educators did not want them, because they have not any teachers to supply them with.

They were objecting to having their own children educated in those schools in the District of Columbia, but they had not any teachers they could employ to use them in Maryland if we should send the schools there, though it was stated that they would like a few of these portable schools in order to send to some parts of Maryland where they have a teacher occasionally, and they would use them rather than build schools for themselves.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have only a moment.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman can always get time. The gentleman's part of Maryland will never take over any of these portable schools from the District, because the people there send their children to the very best million-dollar schools that we have in this District, and the gentleman from Maryland has seen to that always. What do they want with portable schools?

Mr. MADDEN. I should say the gentleman from Maryland is clever, and he would be cleverer still if he would report from his legislative committee some legislation about the sewers, the absence of which he complains.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Maryland and his Maryland constituents have had sewer connection and water connection and light connection and school connection and every other kind of connection here in Washington that can be thought of. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations has insisted on injecting at this time the question of schools. The statement was made by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska that it was done because the chairman of the committee dealing with District matters has given no consideration to that subject and that I had prevented the consideration of the bill dealing with that question. I referred the bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID] was chairman, and that committee gave careful consideration to the subject matter of the bill and decided that this was an unnecessary hardship to impose on Federal employees, Army and Navy officers, and others who had moved across the line from the District of Columbia into Maryland and Virginia, and unanimously, to the best of my recollection, the committee reported unfavorably upon that bill.

Not only that, but the subject of schools and the attendance of children who live over the imaginary boundary line between the District of Columbia and Maryland was thoroughly considered by this House last year, and by a most decisive vote the House concluded to continue to allow children from the neighboring States who did not crowd the District schools the privilege of attending the District schools. It has been shown time and time again that under the rules adopted by the School Board of the District of Columbia a child from a neighboring State can not enter a District school if by so doing it deprives the child of a citizen of the District of Columbia of the right of attendance, and there has not been a week during the past several months that I have not been importuned by the fathers and mothers of children living across the line in Maryland, whose children have been forced out of the District schools because they were crowded and the preference was given to the District children, although the House had decisively settled that question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The House has never had a chance to pass upon this question as a complete entity. It has only had before it such fractions of it as could be brought in as a limitation on an appropriation bill.

The gentleman refers to this "imaginary boundary line" between his district and the District of Columbia. It is a very real line, is it not, when there comes a conflict between the interests of his constituents and those of the taxpayers of the District of Columbia? It is a real line then, in the judment of the gentleman, is it not?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Well, it is a real line, so far as geographical division is concerned, but it is an invisible line otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say it was a Rhine line? [Laughter.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No. Evidently the gentleman refers to a Volstead Act matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Where allied troops are required to stop the use by outside children of these fine eight-room schools in the District which should have been occupied by the children of the District.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman referred to the fact that parents of children living outside the District complained at being required to take their children out of the District schools?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, those parents pay nothing for the education of their children in the District schools. Many people have been requested to take the children out of the border schools where we needed those exclusively for the children whose parents pay for them.

Those people, as I understand, are asked to come into the District schools that are not crowded. I am told by the superintendent of schools that practically in every instance the constituents of the gentleman from Maryland say Congress has given them the right to go to any school they want, and they will have their children go to the Chevy Chase School or Takoma Park, D. C., School, or anywhere else in the District that your Maryland folks want, no matter who is crowded out. That is to say, they are willing to have the District children crowded out and insist on their being allowed to educate their children here in the District wherever they want.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. What I wanted to do principally was to discuss the fiscal relationship between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government. I want to point out certain things that the committee has overlooked, and the fact that it has given attention to certain things over which they have no authority under the law, matters that should come before the legislative committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. If the Committee on Appropriations had overlooked those things to which the gentleman has referred, the gentleman would then complain that the committee had interfered with matters coming under the jurisdiction of his own committee.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I say these are matters that could be dealt with without increasing the tax rate.

Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to another very serious menace in the District of Columbia; namely, the open sewer known as the northeast boundary sewer. It empties into an open lake in the vicinity of the Eastern High School, which is one of the really splendid school buildings in the District of Columbia; and it has been suggested by the War Department that the District Commissioners remedy this condition, which is unsanitary and unhealthful. The District Commissioners have recommended, or at least have advised and suggested, that the present northeast boundary sewer be continued to be drained into the Anacostia River, and estimate for an expenditure of $1,200,000 for the completion of this highly desirable project in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand exactly what the gentleman means by the "northeast boundary sewer."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This is the sewer which is called the largest sewer in the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. You mean the boundary sewer which is intended to take up the Maryland sewage.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No. I refer to the sewer extending west to Fourteenth Street and north to Park Road and Rock Creek Church Road and south to Florida Avenue. In time of storm it discharges at Twenty-second and A Streets NE.

Mr. CASEY. Every dollar recommended by the Bureau of the Budget has been recommended by the committee for sewers carried in this bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will answer that by saying let us not be deceived as to the actual conditions that exist. I compliment the committee on its generosity in carrying most of the items that come from the Budget, and in having the courage to increase many items, so far as respecting the grossly underpaid employees of the District. I commend the committee for that. But let us not be deceived. Who wrote 90 per cent of this bill? The Bureau of the Budget. I should say 95 per cent of it. Who wrote it? General Lord? No; not General Lord. One of his subordinates. He fixes the maximum amount, and when the commissioners send it to the Bureau of the Budget they send it back and say, "Cut it $3,000,000, cut it $6,000,000, keep it down," and this bill, which has been so highly commended upon this floor, is 95 per cent written by a subordinate of General Lord in the Bureau of the Budget. So let us not be deceived as to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. We had before us Major Gordon, of the sewer department, and we gave him complete leeway to tell the committee anything he wanted that was not included in the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Well, I will go off of the subject of the sewers.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; let us stay with it, because the gentleman has made a statement I do not think is justified.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I made the statement that the sewer I referred to is being discharged in the near vicinity of the Eastern High School and into a sluggish stream. The War Department requested that a study be made of it, and the District Commissioners have recommended to some one that it be continued to the Anacostia River. When the gentleman from Nebraska said it was a Maryland scheme I described the area of it and showed that it was not a Maryland proposition at all. However, I did not bring it forward for that reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want the House to understand that we are not giving to the District what we were asked for.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not say you have not. You have given for sewers and you have given for new paving, but for some unknown reason you have cut the item for street repairs, one of the most necessary things in the District of Columbia. I do not think there is a Member on this floor who does not know that the streets of the District of Columbia badly need resurfacing, yet the item for repairing the streets has been cut. It seems to me it would have been much better to have cut some other item and increase the appropriation for resurfacing the streets. But that has not been done. The appropriation has been cut for resurfacing, for gutters, and for putting in shoulders on all roads.

In order that the committee and the House may have the benefit of the estimated total of the necessary and also the desirable improvements in the District of Columbia, I am inserting herewith as a part of my remarks, a list of contemplated improvements and new projects covering an estimated program of five years.

This list was furnished me by the secretary of the board of trade and represents the board's views as to the improvements which will be necessary to consider during that period.

From this list it is ascertainable that if Washington is to be made the city beautiful that the President has recommended and about which Congress has often talked, it would be unfair to put this stupendous burden upon the backs of the taxpayers of the District, and that expenditures in the future should be on a proratio basis.

Among those listed as necessary improvements is the question of an airport, which it is estimated will cost $1,500,000. This, it is proposed, should be built in Virginia, and to my mind, the Federal Government should contribute in planning and constructing here an airport comparable with those that are available in Paris, Belgium, and other capital cities.

LIST OF NECESSARY IMPROVEMENTS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, INCORPORATED IN AN EXPENDITURE PROGRAM FOR COMPLETION WITHIN A PERIOD OF FIVE YEARS

Airport $1,500,000

Under the recent legislation by Congress affecting commerce by air, the Federal Government provides emergency landing fields and lights the airways. The municipalities are required to furnish the landing fields. It is therefore essential that the city of Washington provide an adequate, safe, and convenient airport for the use of the air mail, the air commerce, and of the civilian air activities of the Federal Government. Unusual unanimity among the persons and organizations interested has been obtained on the location of the site and the kind of airport to be obtained. The figure given of $1,500,000 is believed to be an outside figure, and excludes savings which may be expected by the dumping of dredge material from the Potomac River and the dumping of ashes and other refuse from the city of Washington if and when the street-cleaning department is furnished with the necessary trucks, etc., and—if it is felt advisable when the time comes—by the erection of buildings on the field by private parties interested instead of by the municipal government. This project should by all means be started immediately. The sea wall should be built, right-of-way obtained to the field, and roads constructed. After this is done, within the next year or so, the speed of construction of the final airport can be gauged according to the rapidity of the development of aerial commerce.

Farmers' produce market ..... $600,000–$1,000,000

Public Act 776, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, authorized and directed the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to negotiate for the acquirement of a site for the farmers' produce market, at a cost not to exceed $600,000 and to report to Congress with their recommendations not later than December 15, 1927. It is generally admitted that it is advisable for a municipality to provide facilities for a farmers produce market and that is a good investment for the city provided the total cost is held down to a reasonable sum. The present farmers produce market is to be eliminated in the immediate future by the new building program of the Federal Government. The new facilities should therefore be provided without delay. The amount needed, $600,000 to $1,000,000, would depend upon final location.

Extension of northeast boundary trunk sewer, from 21st and A Streets NE. to Anacostia River just south of south lock of Lake Kingman $1,212,000

The northeast boundary sewer, one of the largest sewers in the world, and carrying the combined drainage from an enormous area, extending west to Fourteenth Street NW., north to Park Road and Rock Creek Church Road, and south to Florida Avenue, discharging in times of storm at Twenty-second and A Streets NE. The discharge from this sewer is carried in a sluggish open channel into the recently created Lake Kingman. In that Lake Kingman, created in connection with the Anacostia River development, is designed to be maintained as a more or less quiescent inland lake, the discharge of even diluted sewage will create a decided nuisance.

To remedy this evil, the commissioners have made studies at the behest of the Secretary of War, resulting in a proposal to extend this northeast boundary sewer to discharge at a point below the outlet of Lake Kingman and directly into the Anacostia River.

Since the original conception of this extension there has been constructed the Eastern High School, at a location in close proximity to the present sewer outlet, and as the result of the location of this large school there have been many complaints as to the insanitary condition existing at the mouth of the sewer.

It has been recognized that the above sewer extension must be undertaken before Lake Kingman or this section of Anacostia Park can function as recreation centers.

Oxon Run intercepting sewer $750,000

The Oxon Run drainage area is an area comprising over 2,000 acres, and located between Nichols Avenue and Alabama Avenue on the west and the Maryland line on the east. This area is largely undeveloped. However, several communities have sprung up in this area where streets are dedicated and houses constructed. Notably among these communities is the larger part of Congress Heights and the recent addition of Hillcrest. There are between 200 and 300 houses in the communities referred to above. Despite repeated applications by individuals and citizens' associations, it has been impracticable to provide sanitary sewers for any of these houses due to the lack of an outlet sewer.

The item submitted herewith is for an outlet sewer for this drainage area, which would be located in the valley of Oxon Run and located approximately parallel and close to the District line. This interceptor would eventually discharge by gravity to the site of the proposed treatment sewage plant, at which point its effluent would receive treatment in common with all other treatment of sewage by the District.

For completing upper Potomac interceptor $425,000

This interceptor in its entirety will extend along the north shore of the Potomac River from Rock Creek to the District line, and is designed to intercept all sanitary drainage from the area sloping toward the river between the limits named. There are now four points in the upper Potomac River where large volumes of raw sewage are now being discharged. The construction of this interceptor will result in removing this pollution to the river and in addition will provide an outlet for future Maryland sewage now discharging into the Potomac River just west of the District line and discharging from Edgemoor, Battery Park, a portion of Chevy Chase, Drummond, Somerset, and Friendship Heights.

A reciprocal agreement has been entered into between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the commissioners of the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission whereby Maryland sewage may discharge through the District sewers upon the payment by Maryland to the District of the estimated cost of handling said sewage.

Fifty per cent of this entire interceptor will have been constructed upon the expenditure of funds already appropriated for this sewer.

For completing upper Anacostia main interceptor along the Anacostia River between Benning Road and the District line $423,000

This interceptor is located to flank the east side of the Anacostia River, and to intercept all sewage which now, or at a later date, would discharge in a crude state into said river, and the construction of this interceptor should be carried on more or less simultaneously with the Anacostia River improvement north of Benning Bridge.

At the present time there are, within the limits of the District, two sanitary sewers discharging raw sewage into the east side of the Anacostia River, north of Benning Road. One of these sewers, in addition to carrying the sewage from approximately 5,000 persons residing in the District, also carries the sewage from an additional population in Maryland residing in Capitol Heights. A further program now being considered by the Maryland authorities proposes to contribute more Maryland sewage from Seat Pleasant, which sewage will also discharge through the existing District sewer.

This interceptor will not only intercept sewage from District sewers, but is designed to be available for all of those communities lying in Maryland close to the District line, viz, Silver Spring, Takoma Park, North Takoma, Mount Rainier, Bladensburg, Hyattsville, Riverdale, College Park, Berwyn, and other smaller communities which now discharge crude sewage into the upper reaches of the Anacostia River, and consequently pollute that portion of the Anacostia which traverses the District.

The Maryland sewage from the communities referred to above may discharge into District sewers by virtue of an agreement entered into between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the commissioners of the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, under which agreement the Maryland authorities would pay to the District an amount equal to the cost to the District of pumping said Maryland sewage.

There has already been expended on this project of flanking the east side of the Anacostia River a total of $319,500.

Sewer service for houses where privies exist $4,000,000

There are now being maintained in the District of Columbia 3,431 box privies. The number of such privies are increasing rather than decreasing, as is evidenced by a count which indicates that the number has increased by 682 in the past five years.

To eliminate these privies, which are considered as a source of possible disease, necessitates the coordination of appropriations for grading, for water service, and for sanitary sewers. Sewers, being water carriers, are worthless unless water is available. Water can not be made available until such time as the streets are brought to the established grade, in that it is considered necessary that water mains be laid at a constant depth below the surface.

It is felt that effort should be put forth to introduce sanitary improvements in these sections known as Deanwood, Kenilworth, Burrville, Barry Farm, etc., in which communities the majority of privies exist and which communities are practically without modern improvements.

Site for and construction of incinerators, city refuse division $650,000

The maximum working capacity of the trash-disposal plant is about 800 cubic yards per day. In times of heavy rains, etc., this capacity is materially reduced by the inadequacy of the incinerators to burn the wet paper which can not be baled. At such times it is necessary to place the excess on the Congressional Cemetery dump and burn it there.

In addition to this bulk, a considerable amount of the material received at the Congressional Cemetery dump from the various United States Government activities is of a combustible nature and must be burned daily to avoid the possibility of starting a general fire on the dump.

Inside of three years we will have filled all our present dumps, and by such time a start must be made to send all the material collected in street cleaning and a large proportion of the ashes to some new dumping point. The volume of the street-cleaning material must be reduced by incineration.

There is also a possibility that it may be necessary to forbid the placing of combustible material on the Benning dump owing to the smoke nuisance.

Because of the above conditions, and the constant complaints of various citizens' associations regarding burning materials on dumps, a transfer station, trash-salvaging plant, and incinerators of sufficient capacity should be constructed immediately. It is therefore recommended that $650,000 be appropriated for the acquisition of a site and construction of the above plant.

Site and buildings for garage, shop, etc., city refuse division.. $150,000

The city refuse division owns and occupies a building in the interior of square 367, covering 12,500 square feet of ground. This was originally used as a stable, but is being converted to use as a garage and shops.

In the very near future the hauling equipment of the department must be entirely motorized. This is mainly due to the scarcity of dumps and the consequent increased length of haul.

The city refuse division has now reached the capacity of the present plant in which are repaired, repainted, and reconstructed all auto trucks used by that division, in addition to the building of all new truck bodies, and it is very necessary to add to the existing building. By the purchase of the balance of the plot the present ground area would be doubled, and the construction of an addition to the building would provide for a garage, shops, and storerooms in an ideal location.

New Chain Bridge---------- $366,000

A new bridge is required to provide adequate capacity for traffic and to insure safety for traffic on this bridge, the carrying capacity of which is uncertain due to deterioration resulting from its age, 54 years.

Connecticut Avenue Bridge over Klingle Road---------- $500,000

A bridge of greater capacity is required to take the place of the existing structure, due to the heavy traffic over Connecticut Avenue.

New Calvert Street Bridge---------- $1,200,000

The replacement of Calvert Street Bridge by a bridge to conform with the treatment of Rock Creek Park is projected to afford increased capacity for traffic.

The roadway of the existing structure is inadequate and the bridge has not sufficient strength for the heavy traffic of the present day.

Twentieth Street Bridge over Piney Branch---------- $300,000

A bridge of greater capacity with improved alignment is required to take the place of the existing light iron bridge.

Municipal center, purchase of land---------- $9,000,000
Municipal center, buildings---------- 10,000,000

The act authorizing the acquisition of the triangle south of Pennsylvania Avenue for the erection of various Federal buildings authorizes the taking over by the Federal Government of the District Building and the square to the south of the present building, which was considered available for a much-needed expansion of the District Building. As a new location for the District offices will have to be obtained in order to replace the building and site to be taken over by the Federal Government, and as there are a number of District activities in rented buildings and a number of other District activities which are not now adequately provided for, it is proposed to purchase the area between Pennsylvania Avenue on the south, Louisiana Avenue, D Street, and Indiana Avenue on the north, Seventh Street on the west and Third Street on the east, for the site of the new municipal center.

It is deemed highly desirable that the purchase of this site should be made at one time in order that the part to be improved by the construction of new buildings will not enhance the value of the property not acquired. By purchasing the whole site at one time a material saving can be made over piece-meal purchase. It would not be necessary or desirable to proceed with the construction at a rapid rate, and present plans call for a development of square 490 as the site for a building to house the various courts of the District of Columbia, and it is expected that this would be the first part of the site developed. Provision for the construction of the building should be made at the rate of about $2,000,000 per year, and when the building on this square is completed the development of square 491, directly south of this square, should be undertaken to provide suitable quarters for the police and fire departments, recorder of deeds office, and some other District activities.

The site can be purchased for about $9,000,000. The court building will have approximately 8,068,000 cubic feet, at an estimated cost of $1 per cubic foot, while the building on square 491 will be approximately the same size and same cost.

Opening and extension of streets and avenues---------- $4,000,000

The opening and extension of the following streets and avenues is important in that they will provide better traffic conditions in their respective locations; furthermore, land values are increasing, and the longer these projects are delayed the greater will be the cost of their acquisition. Dedications have already been made to the District of portions of all of these streets.

Nebraska Avenue is the only street on the highway plan in the area west of Rock Creek Park, excepting Western Avenue, which extends directly from the Potomac River to Rock Creek Park. This street is approximately a mile east of Western Avenue, and crosses Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Connecticut Avenues, and connects up Wesley Heights, Tenleytown, and Chevy Chase.

Foxhall Road: This road connects Wesley Heights and American University with Conduit Road and intersects Conduit Road just west of Georgetown University. A great number of houses were built along this road before the highway plan was established. Many of these houses will have to be moved when the street is widened and, of course, condemnation would be the only procedure. As property values in this section are steadily increasing, it is believed that this street should be condemned as soon as possible.

Potomac Avenue is on the highway plan from Foxall Road to the District line and runs along the high ground overlooking the Potomac River. This street would make a very attractive riverside drive, and for this reason it is believed that steps should be taken to acquire it for its entire length, before any building operations increase the cost of its acquisition.

Colorado Avenue, Thirteenth and Fourteenth Streets are now in process of condemnation.

Maryland Avenue is now in public ownership from Fifteenth Street and Florida Avenue NE. to the the United States Capitol Grounds. The highway plan provides for the extension of this avenue to the Anacostia Park, where it will intersect with Oklahoma Avenue. The opening of this avenue will be of importance in that it will provide a direct connection from the Capitol Grounds to the northern part of the Anacostia Park.

Free Public Library, five-year building and extension program---------- $1,696,000

The organic law establishing the public library, as amended, provides that the said library shall consist of a central library and such number of branch libraries so located and so supported as to furnish books and other printed matter and library service convenient to the homes and offices of all residents of the District of Columbia.

The estimate of $1,696,000 would provide for carrying out the larger items in the five-year building and extension program for the library, in providing for sites and buildings for branch libraries as well as additions to the main library building.

Gallinger Municipal Hospital---------- $3,000,000

In order to equip the Gallinger Municipal Hospital as a complete municipal hospital capable of accommodating all the patients that are proper municipal charges and discontinue the practice of boarding such patients in private institutions, it would be necessary to erect two additional ward buildings similar to the one now under construction. It would also be necessary to erect a suitable nurses' home, staff building, laboratory, and accessory buildings at a total cost of approximately $2,500,000, and an isolation building for the care and treatment of indigent persons suffering from minor contagious diseases, at a cost of approximately $500,000.

District Training School---------- $1,000,000

Additional cottages, school building, dormitory for employees, commissary, and dining-room building, superintendent's residence, and the necessary roads, water and sewer mains, should be provided at the District Training School as soon as possible, because the present demand would undoubtedly fill the school to a number of approximately 600.

Receiving home, division of child welfare---------- $150,000

There should be provided as soon as possible a receiving home for the division of child welfare where children could be received when committed by the courts, given medical and mental examinations and such treatment as necessary and afford opportunity for study and classification before these children are sent to permanent boarding homes or institutions. Such a receiving home, properly equipped, would cost approximately $150,000.

Industrial Home School for white children---------- $250,000

The Industrial Home School for white children, now housed in a group of old dilapidated buildings, should be abandoned. If funds are not to be derived from the sale of the present property it would cost probably $250,000 to provide a proper site and buildings to reestablish the school on a new site.

District of Columbia Jail---------- $500,000

The old-cell wings of the jail have been condemned by competent authority as insanitary and unfit for the confinement of prisoners. To reconstruct the north and south wings, which contain these old cells, would cost probably about $500,000.

Tuberculosis Hospital $150,000

Congestion at the Tuberculosis Hospital requires an early enlargement of that institution. There should be an additional ward building at a cost of approximately $100,000, and a building to house the medical staff, orderlies, and other employees, many of whom are now obliged to live away from the hospital. This building would cost approximately $50,000.

Public schools—Five-year building program $11,000,000

The carrying out of the five-year school-building program, as authorized by the act of Congress approved February 26, 1925, is $3,000,000 in arrears at the present time. In addition, during the two years remaining of the period for carrying out that program, $8,000,000 will be required.

Elimination of grade crossings $680,000

The grade crossings which should be eliminated to provide safety for traffic are placed in the order of importance, as follows: Michigan Avenue, $275,000; Chestnut Street (Fern Street), $164,000; Eastern Avenue (Quarles Street), $153,000; Bates Road (Varnum Street), $88,000.

Total of necessary improvements $53,902,000

LIST OF DESIRABLE IMPROVEMENTS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Water-front development, Washington Channel $3,691,000

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1925, authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, authorized and directed the Secretary of War to cause preliminary examinations and surveys to be made of the water front on the north side of the Washington Channel, D. C., with the view of surveying same and preparing and submitting plans and estimates of cost for the construction of an adequate terminal or terminals which would provide appropriate facilities for water transportation and for interchange of traffic between vessels and the railroads and highways, respectively, including any recommendations which may be deemed advisable for coordinating the full commercial use of said water front and the approaches, with the beautification thereof.

In accordance with the direction of Congress, the District engineer officer (United States Army Corps of Engineers), after most intensive study, has prepared and submitted a report on the improvement of the water front along the Washington Channel.

The item of $3,691,600 is an estimate by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the cost of providing this very desirable improvement.

Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge over Anacostia River $651,000

The construction of a bridge in the line of Pennsylvania Avenue crossing Anacostia River is required to provide capacity for the heavy traffic using that bridge and also to permit dredging of the river as proposed by the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. The piers supporting the bridge have pile platforms, the piles being cut off at mean low-water level. Provision is also required for traffic on the river by the construction of a draw span at this crossing.

Benning Bridge over Anacostia River $470,000

The construction of a bridge to take the place of Benning Bridge is required for the same reasons outlined in the above statement concerning the Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge.

P Street Bridge over Rock Creek $350,000

The construction of a bridge to take the place of the present P Street Bridge across Rock Creek is required to provide for the Rock Creek Parkway.

Watts Branch Valley storm-water sewer $950,000

Watts Branch Valley extends easterly from the Anacostia River through Deanwood, and this stream drains a large watershed located partly in the District and partly in Maryland. The stream traverses private property through the major part of its length, and is located through a very flat section of the District. Freshet conditions cause this stream to rise out of its banks, inundating large areas of adjacent property.

This valley, with the exception of Rock Creek, is the largest one traversing the District, and to control that portion of the stream which lies within the District would require the construction of over three miles of conduit varying in size from 12 to 15 feet in span.

As to whether this important storm-water conduit should be given open treatment or a closed conduit construction is still a mooted question, and before final decision is reached the National Capital Park and Planning Commission will be requested to study this situation.

Sewage treatment works $2,250,000

At the present time all District sewage is discharged in a more or less crude state directly into the Potomac River, at a point some three miles below Hains Point.

Any impurities such as sewage which are discharged into a body of water become purified by oxidation. In the process of oxidation, oxygen existing in the water is consumed, and if too much of this oygen is consumed from the water fish life is destroyed, in that their life depends upon the water-carried oxygen, without which they would suffocate.

The commissioners being cognizant of this fact have visualized for some years that eventually further treatment must be given to the District sewage before same is discharged into the Potomac River, and with this in view they have, within the past few years, acquired a considerable tract of land in the vicinity of Blue Plains as a site for a future sewage treatment plant. This site is located at the extreme southern point of the District, which is the only strategic location to which all the sewage of the District may be discharged by gravity.

Before venturing upon an expenditure of this magnitude, the commissioners propose to make a request of the Public Health Service that they conduct a survey of the lower Potomac to determine what degree of purification the sewage must undergo at this time. Moreover, the commissioners have in mind that before actually making expenditures for these works they would request authority for appointing a commission of well known sanitary engineers to make a detailed study, with report, as to the best type of treatment works to install.

Key Bridge approach $200,000

Certain desirable improvements should be made in the north approach to the new Francis Scott Key Bridge, to the end that the "bottle-neck" situation which now arises under heavy traffic conditions may be eliminated and a more adequate approach to the bridge proper may be provided.

National Zoological Park $1,145,000

This is an estimate of improvements recommended by the Director of the National Zoological Park, and includes provision for the construction of new exhibition buildings for animals and birds, remodeling of and additions to exhibition buildings, open barless pit for polar bears, monkey pit, three stone-arch entrances to the park, and a fence around the park.

Public buildings and public works $4,501,600

This is an estimate of improvements recommended by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and includes provision for construction of two additional bathing pools, $900,000; Meridian Hill Park, $400,000; Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway, roads and bridges, $2,000,000, and sea wall, $180,000; repairs to Tidal Basin wall, $7,500; East Potomac Park, walks, $13,000, and widening roads, $65,000; lighting around reflecting pool, Lincoln Memorial, $6,100; and improvement of the Mall, Second to Fifteenth Streets, $930,000.

National Capital Park and Planning Commission $15,000,000

To carry out a desirable plan of development of the National Capital during the next five years it is estimated that the above sum will be required by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

Total of desirable improvements	$29,209,200
Total of necessary improvements	53,902,000
Total	83,111,200

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When I first came to Congress the tax rate in the District of Columbia was 90 cents on the $100. That was the total tax the people of the District of Columbia paid.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the tax rate here has been $1.50 since 1878, and that was fixed by law.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought the gentleman would say that. It was so arranged as to assessments, allowed by law to be made for only part value, that when you paid the tax it was only 90 cents on the $100. The assessments were camouflaged and the rate was camouflaged, so that when you paid the tax it was just 90 cents on the $100, and then we raised it to $1.10; then to $1.20; then to $1.30; then to $1.40; then to $1.60; and then to $1.80. During this past fiscal year it was $1.80. For this present fiscal year it is $1.70 on the $100.

I have been fighting the gentleman from Maryland ever since I have been here on that proposition, he wanting the tax in the District just as low as possible for many of his Maryland people who mostly live here in Washington, and I wanting it commensurate with what was fair to the rest of the people of the United States.

Let me show you how unfair the newspapers are on this subject. Mr. Clayton came before our committee the other day and said the tax rate for this present fiscal year was $1.80. I said it was not, but that it was $1.70. They have lowered it for the present fiscal year to $1.70: The next day a Washington newspaper, the News, said I had contended the tax rate was $1.40, and that I had made a mistake, when my whole argument to Mr. Clayton was that he was mistaken in saying it was $1.80, as it had been reduced to $1.70.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman is not complaining about the accuracy of that, is he? That is fairly accurate.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; for this newspaper, it is; but I want to keep the record straight as we go along.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is fairly accurate for a Washington paper.

Mr. BLANTON. For the News or Times, yes. The Star is reliable. When the gentleman from Maryland and I began work on this committee together the whole people back home, the taxpayers all over the United States in the 48 States, paid one-half of every bit of the civic expense of the people who live in the District. They paid one-half of the paving of streets and alleys; they paid one-half of their lighting system; they paid one-half of the expense of the police force and of the fire force and equipment; they paid one-half of the salaries of the 2,500 teachers; they paid one-half of the cost of furnishing free school books here; they paid one-half of the cost of erecting our million-dollar school buildings; they paid one-half of the playgrounds and swimming pools; they paid one-half of the cost of running the water system. Of course, the Government owned the original main water conduit, but they paid also one-half of running it. The people of the United States paid one-half of the expense of erecting the municipal buildings here in Washington and municipal salaries and the hospitals and of the million-dollar bridges. The people back home paid one-half of all the civic expense in the District of Columbia. It was unfair to the people of the United States. They had their own taxes to pay and then they had half of the taxes of the people of the District of Columbia to pay in addition. No wonder Washington became a mecca for tax dodgers. I could name you some of the most prominent rich people of the world who came here to establish a nominal residence for tax purposes, and I can take you out and show you their palatial residences which for at least nine months of the year are nailed up and with nobody in them. They are just nominal residences for taxation purposes only.

A few of us here began to rebel against such a situation, and we began to let the people of the United States know the facts, and this knowledge was reflected in a change of the law here, but the main changes we have been able to get were through the Committee on Appropriations, through the help of Brother CRAMTON and others. We never could get it out of the committee of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN]. He is the chairman of that committee and he has about 15 subcommittees. When he wants to pigeonhole a bill he knows exactly where to refer it, and there is no more chance of getting a bill that he does not want out of his hand-picked subcommittee with a favorable report than there is for a snowball to exist somewhere down below.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The committee brought out one last week.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. We are not surprised at our friend coming here and proposing this amendment. He has made a fight on this floor every time we have tried to make Maryland and Virginia children pay their school expenses. He has come in here at the last moment and with his bland, pleasing appearance and the influence he exerts with us, he carries it right at the last moment every time; but we ought not to let him carry it this time. We ought to put a provision in this bill that will mean in no uncertain terms that when the people of the District of Columbia pay their school expenses they pay for their own children and do not pay for FRED ZIHLMAN'S constituents over in Maryland and for WALTON MOORE'S constituents in Virginia.

Up until this year there were nearly 3,000 children from Maryland and Virginia going to school here in the District of Columbia, getting their tuition free and getting their schoolbooks free, paid for by the people of the District of Columbia and by the taxpayers of the United States, and this year there are over 2,000 of such children. Let Virginia educate her own children and let Maryland educate her children.

Our friend ZIHLMAN'S district has been getting hand-outs from this Government every year since back in 1841. [Laughter.] I looked up an old RECORD of way back in 1841, when there was a big fight made against a tremendous expenditure for the building of a big highway through the gentleman's district.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That was in 1807.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but 1841 was when the main fight was started against it. His district has been getting hand-outs ever since.

Now, what are we going to do about it? Are we going to look after the interests of Brother HERSEY'S people in Maine and the people in Connecticut and the people of Ohio and the people of Texas and consider all of their interests, or are we just going to keep on voting on behalf of these two districts in Maryland and in Virginia?

I have no unkind feeling toward the people of Washington. They are among the finest people in the world. I fraternize with them here and I believe I have as many friends among them, in spite of my fights on this tax question, as my friend, the gentleman from Maryland. They are a bully, fine set of people and they will appreciate you when you stand up and do your duty, even though it may hurt them a little bit; but as long as they are paying a tax rate of only $1.70 on the $100, they are not hurt.

If you will go right over here to Baltimore, in Maryland, 40 miles from Washington, and find out what the people there pay on a Packard car and what they pay as personal taxes and as real-estate taxes, and then come over here and see the low tax rate on same in the District of Columbia, you will see at once that the people of Baltimore are paying twice what the people of the District of Columbia pay, and it is because of this fight that the gentleman from Maryland makes here every year. Oh, of course, it makes him popular and they talk about drafting him for the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman has that distinction, not me.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they do not have to draft me. [Laughter and applause.] I will say to my friend that whenever I am drafted I respond. [Laughter.] I do not wait and hang back. I am right in the front every time leading on a proposition that I know to be right.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Does the gentleman go to the finish?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I have never failed to go to the finish yet.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I just wanted to know if the gentleman was going to finish in this fight.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I am going to be over yonder in the other end of the building watching this very proposition next year [laughter and applause], and I will be in a position where I can stop you, FRED, when you send this kind of a proposition over there. We sometimes can not do it here under the five-minute rule. Under our procedure here, with 435 Members, you can not stop these things, but you can stop them over there. That is one reason I am willing to make the sacrifice. [Laughter and applause.]

We ought to take care of this proposition by backing up our friend SIMMONS and his splendid committee. We ought to back up Mr. CRAMTON on this proposition. I am too good a prohibitionist to follow him all the way sometimes on some things. He gets a little off on the prohibition question sometimes, and I will not follow him when he goes to voting for the Hawley bill, but he is right on this fiscal system and I am with him.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute motion. On page 2, line 6, in lieu of the motion proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, I move to strike out "9,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "7,000,000." and on that I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Michigan amending the amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am offering a substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 2, line 6, strike out "9,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "7,000,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] has made an appeal that abandons the proportionate plan which he has heretofore advocated and now urges the lump-sum plan, but that it be increased from $9,000,000 to $10,000,000. He has talked about an investigation of the question and a study by a commission, and so forth, but he has laid down in his discussion no basis whatever on which any commission could proceed to determine whether $9,000,000 was right or $10,000,000 was right, except this—that the District needs more improvements.

I had thought of making a more or less extended address on the subject and have so stated to several Members of the House, but after hearing the address the other day of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], following the very careful consideration given the question by his able subcommittee, I realize the uselessness of discussing the question at length or attempting to supplement that presentation.

But at this moment it does seem proper that I say something about how the lump-sum plan came to be adopted. The gentleman from Maryland has presented here something about the needs of the District—that he considers urgent for schools, sewers, and water mains—and I assume that he is correct in his statement. I am willing to assume that there does exist now in the District a need for more schools, sewers, and water mains. But what community in the United States does not have such needs? Certainly no growing community. The Treasury of the United States is not to be expected to meet these needs in other cities of the United States, and it ought not to be expected to meet them in the city of Washington, the District of Columbia, further than some basis would justify it. Simply the fact that they need these things is not enough justification to call on the Treasury to supply them.

I will say this: I have been abused regularly, constantly, and consistently by the newspapers of Washington since the adoption of the lump-sum plan came from an amendment that I offered to an appropriation bill. I have been abused constantly, pictured as an enemy of progress in the District, whereas there is no one in this Congress, no one in the District, who is more desirous of seeing Washington a beautiful city and worthy of being the Capital of the country than am I. But I do not propose to see my constituents unfairly burdened in bearing the expenses—not of the Capital City, but of the people of Washington.

The gentleman refers to the need of schools, sewers, and water mains as being urgent. If it had not been for the adoption of the lump-sum plan the gentleman from Maryland even could not begin to picture the urgency of the needs that would confront the city now. Here was the situation: During the World War the city grew rapidly in population. New areas were built up that would be productive of taxes. The new areas grew up and the population increased with a great increase of District property and District needs, but without equal expansion of Federal property or needs. There was created a terribly urgent need for sewers, streets, lights, water mains, and all that, but following the World War—when the country was overburdened with taxation—it was not to be considered, any great increase of the Federal contribution to District expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. What I sought to do was to arrive at some plan so that the urgent needs of the people of the District could be taken care of without unfairly burdening the Federal Treasury that was staggering already under great burdens of taxation. The people here were paying $1.20 or something like that. The people in my district were paying $3 or $4. I did not feel that the people of the District had reached their capacity to pay for the things they needed, but under the proportionate plan of 40–60 every time $10 was added to the appropriation bill $4 came out of the Federal Treasury. I offer the lump-sum amendment providing that our full contribution should be $8,000,000 plus certain fees that would come back. Later in a compromise with the Senate it was made $9,000,000 plus the fees, and that is what it is now.

Under that plan we would contribute the $9,000,000; and then, however much more the appropriations were for the District, the District would take care of the balance. In other words, it opened the way by which contributions of the District could be increased without increasing the Federal burden. That is what has made possible the development of the last four years. It is that system that has made it possible to get appropriation bills through here, and has made possible the tremendous increase in facilities in the way of schools, sewers, water mains, and so forth, that mean so much in the Washington of to-day.

It could not have been done otherwise. Before that we were always being attacked as being parsimonious with the District. Under the lump-sum plan it was contemplated that the appropriation bills would be larger than they had been before; and they are larger; but because they are larger that does not mean that we must abandon the system. The purpose of the system was to permit appropriation bills commensurate with the needs of the District. Before then we were attacked as being parsimonious. I contended, when I offered that amendment, that it would permit the people of the District to occupy a more dignified position when they came before Congress. Theretofore they had come here asking for money from the Treasury when they urged improvements. Now, when they come to the committee and say that they want more expenditure for this or that purpose, it is their money that they are urging the expenditure of, and they are entitled to our consideration.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Where do the citizens of the District of Columbia get this opportunity of urging these needed improvements? To what tribunal, to what august body do they present these demands?

Mr. CRAMTON. They get a pretty good hearing in the newspapers. I have always noted that.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. In other words, the gentleman concedes that they have no authorities to whom they can go?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, I have not conceded that. I assume this, and I imagine the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] and other members of that subcommittee, will confirm it. I know that the members of the subcommittee have been making a study of these things in contact with the people, and I assume that anyone who has information as to any need will have had no difficulty in getting to any member of that committee to present those needs.

Mr. SIMMONS. The people of the District have their commissioners, they have their city officials, and always during the three years that I have been a member of this subcommittee we have given hearings to absolutely every citizen in the District who asked for it, without exception.

Mr. CASEY. And I want to say for the information of the gentleman that during our investigation into this matter, we asked the District Commissioners to furnish us with a map of the District of Columbia with an outlay of the sewer system, spoken of by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], extending to those places which he talked about, and the commissioners admitted that they never had had any such map, and the question had never been studied, and they have never made any requests of Congress for additional sums for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. And may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the idea that he wishes to convey to the House is that the first time the question was given consideration was when the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself raised it? I refer to this question of sewerage.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; the hearings show that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, there are some political and some newspaper needs that even exceed the real needs of the people of the District. The fact is that the people have full opportunity of presenting their needs, and they have an opportunity to adopt resolutions. I notice one thing in the current year. It has gotten to a point when occasionally a meeting of those citizens will adopt a resolution that they do not want their tax rate any higher. I assume that if the gentleman from Maryland were to offer an amendment here providing for all the needs that he has mentioned he would get protests from at least two-thirds of the citizens' associations of the District of Columbia, since under the present system it is their money that is being expended.

I just want to conclude with this, that the idea of the lump-sum plan as set forth in my attempt was not an exact and scientific decision as to the amount that should be contributed. It was based upon the thought that we would continue to spend what we had been spending, although I thought it was too high. There has now been made a study and a showing. The newspapers of the District have been insisting that in determining how much we should contribute there should be a comparison of the property of the Federal Government and of the value of the property of others in the District of Columbia. That has been their insistence from the first.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] has shown that when the sacred half-and-half theory was born it came from that parentage; that theory of an assessment of Federal property, joined with the agile and fertile brains of some people here, which permitted them to include in that assessment of Federal property the streets and highways of the District of Columbia. That is the theory upon which our 50-50 contribution was based—an assessment of our property—and now it is shown to us by an investigation of this subcommittee, more thorough, more logical, and complete than any hybrid commission that could be created would accomplish, that if we are to base it on that plan, then instead of its being $9,000,000, as the bill carries, or $10,000,000, as the gentleman from Maryland proposes, it ought not to be over $6,000,000. In view of that I offered my amendment to the gentleman's amendment to make it $7,000,000. However, so strong is my desire to be liberal to the District, taking into consideration that this is our Federal Capital, I am not disposed to press the $7,000,000 amendment unduly.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Does the gentleman know of any other case where the Government—State, county, or municipal—pays any taxes or makes any contribution toward the government of any municipality within its boundaries?

Mr. CRAMTON. No. And this Congress uniformly refuses to do so as to any other place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LICENSE BUREAU

For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $17,820; temporary clerk hire, $1,500; in all, $19,320.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: Page 4, on line 24, after the figures "$19,320," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That hereafter no person shall practice phrenology in the District of Columbia without paying the license tax named in paragraph 32, section 7, of the District of Columbia appropriation act, approved July 1, 1902, subject to the proviso contained in said paragraph."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, probably this provision is subject to a point of order. I have consulted the chairman of the District legislative committee and the ranking member on the Democratic side, and others on the committee. The amendment is designed to do away with the gypsy fortune tellers who now infest Pennsylvania Avenue and other parts of Washington. If it is adopted, it will have the effect of doing away with these gypsy fortune tellers. I thought that ought to be stated.

Mr. HUDSON. What will they be required to pay as a license?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are not required to pay anything now, nor required to have a license.

Mr. HUDSON. If this is adopted what will they have to pay as a license?

Mr. SIMMONS. Twenty-five dollars a year.

Mr. HUDSON. Do you expect to drive them out in that way?

Mr. SIMMONS. The chief of police can deny them a license in his discretion.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it is a very dangerous precedent to license it.

Mr. HUDSON. If the gentleman is trying to control it by licensing it, I do not think he will control it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You should not license it. By licensing it you appear to be legalizing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No license is necessary at present.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What I fear is that the gentleman is in a manner legalizing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gypsy fortune tellers are now practicing their trade without a license and can not be stopped.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The only way to stop it is to make it a penal offense. We do it in New York City and in New York State. Anybody who undertakes to predict the future is prohibited from practicing that supposed art. We have cleaned them out in New York City.

Mr. HUDSON. I am not going to oppose this amendment. On the contrary, I hope it will be adopted; but I do hope that the District legislative committee will bring in legislation here that will put these people out of business. You may have a chief of police who will give them a license.

Mr. SIMMONS. At the present time there is no way for even the chief of police to stop them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The chief of police can not even use his discretion in refusing to issue a license. Suppose an applicant applied for a license and the chief of police refused. The applicant may mandamus the chief of police if he refuses to license an applicant and licenses anybody else. You can not get away from that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The licenses are to be issued by the chief of police in his discretion.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But there is always a point and limit to the discretion of the police officials.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman from New York knows that the chief of police has it in his power to refuse a license. But this does not overcome the evil.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the superior value of experience is a truth almost axiomatic, it is so frequently expressed. "It is on the anvil of discussion that the spark of truth will fly" is almost a bromide, and it is and always will remain true that it is by and through discussion that legislative, economic, judicial, and governmental truths are ascertained. The experience of a city of a size similar to that of Washington and a population approximately the same may be of value to the people of the District of Columbia. For years the city of New Orleans, pursuing the legal and political plan adopted by most of the cities, had executive, legislative, and judicial departments of government elected by the people every four years. We got along fairly well with it; but finally our people, who are somewhat like the other people in the United States, with slight differences due to environment—finally our people determined on a commission form of government, and now we have a mayor and four commissioners, and they are invested with full and complete powers to discharge all the functions which devolve upon a city of that size, which has about 450,000 inhabitants. Those four commissioners and the mayor in New Orleans have executive power, and it is also their function to legislate by adopting ordinances and rules and regulations which have the force and effect of law. They even discharge quasijudicial functions. That is, they appoint recorders, who impose penalties for the vindicating and enforcement of municipal ordinances. We derive our charter in the city by a grant from the State. The city charter here in Washington is called the organic law. But there is no difference in the two propositions from a political and legal standpoint.

I have often wondered why the city of Washington could not be granted full, plenary, complete, and exemplary powers in order to discharge obligations which necessarily rest upon a city having the population and requirements of Washington. I have thought, with many of my countrymen, I suppose, why on earth a committee in charge of the affairs of the District of Columbia has to come to the House of Representatives—and then our enactment goes to the Senate—for the purpose of adopting a rule or regulation or ordinance that would prohibit fortune telling and other fake practices for imposing on the credulous people of the District and those who come here.

Why, it does look absurd almost to the standpoint of causing laughter from people who have given municipalities and their functioning any thought at all, that the Congress of the United States should be called upon, with its multitudinous duties of a national character, to pass upon the wisdom and the necessity of some little regulation with respect to traffic on the streets or with respect to suppressing what is generally regarded as pestiferous fraud upon the credulous and those who are not well informed and who seek fortune-tellers to divine the future.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will be surprised to know that well-informed people go and have their fortunes told. We had that experience in New York City and those people even opposed the law.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I suppose that superstitution is the vice of a great many who pretend to despise it. That is about the size of it, and I think I understand the gentleman thoroughly.

Mr. CASEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, in the city to which the gentleman refers, the people have the right to vote and elect their own municipal authorities; they also spend their own money, but here is involved an appropriation of $9,000,000 from the Federal Treasury to be spent by officers who are not subject to recall or removal from office by the taxpayers of the city. That may make a difference.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. It may, but really I do not see why it should make any difference. I do not see why the commissioners should not be permitted to discharge the functions of their office in the fullest and most complete manner and to meet all the exigencies and emergencies that spring into existence daily in the administration of a big city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I have heard this proposition as to what the Government should contribute to the support of the District of Columbia debated and discussed seriously and facetiously ever since I came here, which is about 10 years ago. I have not made up my mind fully upon the matter because I thoroughly understand it has its complexities and a good many bewilderments. I understood it was stated here on the floor that it is conceded the value of all the Federal property, real and personal, if it has any personal property, is approximately $407,000,000 and that if the tax rate which is applied to all other private and personal property were applied to that it would be something a little more or less than $7,000,000 per annum. I do not know how successfully that idea has been controverted by the friends of the District of Columbia, and I imagine there may be other factors which will enter into a decision of the matter which may make for some permanent policy upon the part of the Federal Government with respect to the District of Columbia. I do know that in all other cities of the United States of America Federal property is not taxed at all but, of course, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] has said, this being the Capital of the Nation there are some difficulties with respect to the amount the Federal Government should contribute.

I may say, however, that I have never believed in a short-minded or short-visioned policy with respect to the administration of any great city. Cities are like the individuals that compose them. You can not be shabby with a city any more than you can with a man or woman, and a city that is wanting in dignity is about as poorly off as an individual wanting in that regard.

I remember that the lamented McKinley was in New Orleans a number of years ago. He had gone down there to discuss the sugar tariff at the invitation of the sugar people of Louisiana, and I might give you some information or a good story in regard to that trip. It was thought at that time that the leading people in the financial, industrial, agricultural, and commercial activities of Louisiana were about to turn Louisiana over to the Republican Party in that presidential election then pending; that is, they were to go Republican. But there are difficulties in the way of the success of all plans. "The wisest plans of men and mice gang aft aglee." The issue at that time which overshadowed all others and, like Aaron's rod, swallowed all other rods, was the race question thrust on us by some who thoughtlessly, I hope not heartlessly, undertook to trample out of existence Anglo-Saxon-Celtic civilization and supplant it with mongrelism and Africanism. That issue was brought up and forced to the front by men who feared the political effects and consequences which would flow from the negroes misconstruing reaction, and it changed the attitude at the last moment of those who were going to put the State over for McKinley. McKinley said in that address——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has again expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I want to finish this contribution to the information of the Members of the House. McKinley said there, with 20,000 people in the arena in which he spoke, "I do not believe in a cheap coat because a cheap coat inevitably will make for a cheap man." That may not have been the most intellectual argument that could be made on the tariff, but for some inscrutable reason it had the effect of carrying that big crowd off its feet and it went wild with enthusiasm for McKinley and for the utterance he had delivered with respect to what makes for a great, self-respecting people. In that utterance the masses found comfort. They saw in it good wages which make for decent, upstanding American men and women. It makes for that purchasing power, without which the wheels of prosperity are slowed up, if not stopped altogether. You can not beat them down into poverty; you can not clothe them in shabby attire, put them on half-soled and broken shoes, and expect them to live up to the highest traditions of a great Republic like this. [Applause.[

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has again expired.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose sought by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] in offering this amendment, but I can not vote for it because it is not the proper way of going about it. There is only one way to do a thing, and that is to do it the right way. You can not enact a penal law by putting a limitation on appropriations. I will go further than anyone else on the floor of this House in limiting appropriations to achieve a certain purpose

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Surely.

Mr. SIMMONS. I frankly stated that this proviso was subject to a point of order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I know the gentleman did.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is not a limitation at all, but it is the enactment of substantive law in this bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Absolutely. The gentleman was perfectly fair about it. But if you are going to do it that way, you might as well go the whole way and put in a penal provision that it shall be unlawful hereafter for any person to predict the future or relate the past for a consideration or otherwise, and that any person who violates such a law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for 30 days. That is the way to do it, and then the practice will be stopped.

This is going to give rise to all sorts of complications, legal and otherwise. Another thing, gentlemen, it is not safe to vest so much discretion in the chief of police, no matter who he may be. You can not make him the sole arbiter of what phrenology is and what astrology is and what palm reading is and what crystal gazing may be. The one thing we are trying to do all the time is not to vest great discretionary power in our police departments, but say what the law shall be and then let the police enforce the law, and not give to a chief of police the power to say, "All right; I will denote you a phrenologist. Here is your license, and you may go on and tell fortunes." Then some one else may come along whom he does not like and he will not grant him a license.

I am sure the proponents of this amendment do not desire to do any such thing, but instead of curbing this evil you are going to legalize it to a certain extent and you are going to place in the hands of the police department an arbitrary power that I am sure you never intended.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. How is the gentleman able to tell that there is not something to these things? Does the gentleman know you can not read the future by the past? I do not know myself, and I am just wondering if the gentleman has any means of telling.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I did not say that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understood the gentleman to say that we are going to pass a penal provision whereby if a man undertook to judge the future by the past he would be violating the law. I think it was Patrick Henry who said something about that once.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman was not in the Chamber at the time I made my statement.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes; I was listening to the gentleman.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Then the gentleman did not hear me correctly. I did not say any such thing as that. I was simply relating in substance what the penal law is in many States in connection with fortune telling.

Of course, we can make a guess of what the future may be based on past performances. That is easy.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that there is now in the law a provision authorizing the licensing of clairvoyants, soothsayers, fortune tellers, and so forth. There is a proviso, also, that no license shall be issued without the approval of the major and superintendent of police.

Under the present situation these gypsies we have been talking about do not come under the general licensing section, and therefore they are operating without any license, and the chief of police has no authority to stop them. With the adoption of the amendment that is offered they will come under the general section, and I will say to the gentleman from New York that personally I do not agree with section——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With the section itself?

Mr. HOLADAY. No; but that is a matter that must be handled by the legislative committee. By the adoption of this amendment they will come under the general section, and the chief of police has the power to absolutely refuse to issue them a license. It is our understanding that with this amendment adopted the nuisance and evil that has existed will be remedied, as the chief of police will not grant them licenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of traffic signals and markers, painting white lines, labor, and such other expenses as may be necessary in the judgment of the commissioners, $45,000: Provided, That no part of this or any other appropriation contained in this act or that is now available shall be expended for building, installing, and maintaining street-car loading platforms and lights of any description employed to distinguish same.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question.

I notice in this paragraph the appropriation refers to markers, and also the section almost immediately preceding this section is for the purpose of providing "permanent marking on the ground of the system of highways." Are we providing markers under two departments of the city government, or what is the reason for a duplication of appropriation for the purpose of providing markings?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the gentleman refer to the $3,000 item on page 6 for "permanent marking on the ground of the system of highways?"

Mr. HUDSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the permanent highway system and includes the location of streets, avenues, and so forth, under the working out of the permanent highway system of the District.

Mr. HUDSON. Signs?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is under the surveyor's office. The other is an item for the marking of safety zones, no parking signs, and so forth, on the streets.

Mr. HUDSON. I understand.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwest: H Street, First Street to Massachusetts Avenue, $7,200.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 22, line 17, insert "Northwest: First Street, G to H, $3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 21, insert the following: "Northwest: Seventeenth Street, Varnum Street to Webster, $4,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Southeast: Sixteenth Street, Good Hope Road to Ridge Place, $12,900.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, after line 23 insert: "Southwest: Virginia Avenue to D Street, $7,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $1,660,000; to be disbursed and accounted for as "Gasoline tax, road and street improvements," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund and be available immediately: Provided, That no part of such fund shall be used for the improvement of any street or section thereof not herein specified: Provided further, That assessments in accordance with existing law shall be made for paving and repaving roadways where such roadways are paved or repaved with funds derived from the collection of the tax on motor-vehicle fuels and accretions by repayment of assessments: Provided further, That in the performance of the street-paving work specially provided for in this act priority shall be given to those streets which are more in the nature of through thoroughfares or arterial highways.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to correct the total.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 21, strike out "$1,660,000" and insert "$1,675,300."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is merely to correct the total, including the items that have been inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with this section of the bill as to the items of new paving. I am not interested in the paving of any particular street and have made no request either of the District Commissioners or of the committee for the inclusion of any items. I am, however, disappointed that the committee has seen fit to cut down the sum total for the building of the curb, gutters, and shoulders of roads, which I consider the most economic type of construction for the replacement of worn-out paving in this city. You have cut this item in the sum of $90,000, and a further cut in the appropriation for resurfacing worn out streets from $800,000 to $600,000—making a total cut of $290,000 in this paragraph. I am advised that the streets which the District government have been shouldering and resurfacing are being constructed at a cost of one-third of what an entire new pavement would cost.

I would like to know from the chairman of the committee why it was necessary to cut this very meritorious item, and further I would like to ask what he means by the language on page 31 where he makes the appropriation for repairs in the sum of $1,475,000 and then provides that $90,000 shall be paid from the gasoline tax for road and street funds, and whether or not this $90,000 is to be deducted from the $1,675,000 as you have now made it or as carried in the bill, $1,660,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. The $90,000 the gentleman refers to provides that it shall be paid out of the gasoline-tax fund.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It does not come out of the $1,600,000 item?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. The gentleman refers to this as an old item. It is a new item. It is to macadam streets that now have cobblestone gutters, and other streets where they have no curbs they are going to put in concrete shoulders.

We want to recognize their plan, we want to give material encouragement to it, and are giving it to the extent of $200,000. We feel that in view of the complaint that is coming from the people of the District and the requests that we curb their taxes that here was an item on which we possibly should proceed slowly.

About the other $200,000 item the facts are these: For some three or four years now we have been carrying out a program of resurfacing the old streets in the District. The testimony was that next year they would complete the resurfacing program and have the streets up current. They said they wanted $800,000 this year to complete them, that they expected to ask next year for $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is their objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. They said they would want $800,000 in this bill and $400,000 next year, and that the two items, totaling $1,200,000, would complete the resurfacing program in the District.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Does the committee believe that $1,200,000 will do that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Captain Whitehurst's word goes a long way with the committee, and that is his testimony. We felt that we would not be hampering that program at all if, instead of giving them $200,000 this year and $400,000 next year, we allowed them to proceed in a regular order and give them $600,000 this year, and then whatever part of $600,000 they needed next year to complete the program. I call attention further to this, that in this resurfacing work, by the adoption of what is known as the heater method, they have resurfaced far more streets than they expected to when we appropriated the money.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman means that the money has gone further or that they have advanced further with the work?

Mr. SIMMONS. They have advanced further and have done more work with the money that they had. They are nearer completion than they thought they would be when we appropriated the money last year. Captain Whitehurst said if any items were to be cut that this resurfacing item was one they felt could be cut.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And he justified that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. We are going to complete the resurfacing program next year. This is a plan whereby we are giving them ample money to carry on their work.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the paragraph beginning with line 12, on page 44.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word "completely," in line 12.

There was no objection.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill, and read down to line 9, on page 46.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the paragraph contained in the lines 9 to 14, inclusive, on page 46, be postponed until to-morrow, preserving all rights as to points of order and amendment. In other words, that we pass over this item and take it up at the beginning of the reading to-morrow. The item I refer to is as follows:

No part of the appropriations herein made for the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be used for the instruction of pupils who dwell outside the District of Columbia: Provided, That this limitation shall not apply to pupils who are enrolled in the schools of the District of Columbia on the date of the approval of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the paragraph referred to be postponed until to-morrow, with the conditions stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, installation, and maintenance of equipment, for school yards for the purposes of play of pupils, $10,000: Provided, That such playgrounds shall be kept open for play purposes in accordance with the schedule maintained for playgrounds under the jurisdiction of the playground department.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Michigan very kindly told me that it was his purpose to make this request. I ask the gentleman whether he is going to discuss a political subject?

Mr. KETCHAM. No; it is more of a statistical matter with some political implications.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under those circumstances, I think we ought to have a quorum of the committee present.

Mr. KETCHAM. And under those circumstances I shall not press the request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest that the gentleman can get some time to-morrow.

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes. The only reason that I desire to discuss this matter now is because in a sense it refers to some remarks made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] earlier to-day. I thought possibly that two of them ought to appear in the RECORD of the same date. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his request for unanimous consent, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $245,000, and in addition thereto the sum of $100,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $703,500 contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1927, is reappropriated and made available for the purposes of this paragraph, to remain available until June 30, 1930: Provided, That, with the exception of $80,000, no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any site the cost of which shall exceed the full value assessment of such property last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent of such assessed value.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to page 52, after line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: Page 52, after line 5, insert the following paragraph:

"The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $703,500 for the purchase of school building and playground sites, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1927, is continued available until June 30, 1929, for the purchase of school building and playground sites authorized to be acquired in the five-year school-building program act: Provided, That part or parts of a site may be purchased under the 125 per cent limitation if the total cost of the part or parts acquired does not at the time of such purchase exceed 125 per cent of the assessed value."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The school buildings authorized and appropriated for herein shall be constructed with all doors intended to be used as exits or entrances opening outward, and each of said buildings having an excess of eight rooms shall have at least four exits. Appropriations carried in this act shall not be used for the maintenance of school in any building unless all outside doors thereto used as exits or entrances shall open outward and be kept unlocked every school day from one-half hour before until one-half hour after school hours.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] asked unanimous consent to procede out of order for 10 minutes. I did not object to that request, but suggested we should have a quorum to hear his discussion. The main reason for that suggestion was the fact that no representative of the minority who knows much about the tariff schedules was present at that time. Since that time a few of our friends have come in who are somewhat familiar with that subject. I now withdraw the objection and ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in a sense I regret to perform the duty and assume the responsibility which I now take upon myself. At almost every session of Congress, and especially in the early days of the session, some of our good friends on the Democratic side try to inject some political angles into purely economic discussions, and in this connection this afternoon I thought our good friend, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] rather censured the Republican Party for the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber tariff act, particularly in its relationship to agriculture.

I gathered that in his heart he feels, honestly and sincerely, that the farmers of the country have been done a very grave injustice by the enactment of that measure. I gathered further from his remarks he thought that the price relationships with reference to agricultural products had been very unfavorably affected as a result of the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber tariff act.

My responsibility, of course, is not to argue this question but simply to present for the consideration of the gentleman from Alabama the real, hard, cold facts of the situation, and let them speak with very much more eloquence and force than I could possibly muster. So I would just ask the gentleman from Alabama and the others who possibly hold to his political philosophy to secure at their leisure and convenience a copy of a publication furnished by the Department of Agriculture through its Bureau of Economics, entitled "The Agricultural Situation." I am now about to read from the December 1 copy of this publication. It is issued monthly. Particularly am I going to quote from "The general trend of prices and purchasing power," on page 9. I would like the particular attention of all interested Members of the House, and I am glad there are so many here at this hour to listen to what I have to say on this very important subject. [Applause.]

My recollection is that the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act went into effect in September of 1922. Naturally, then, I would expect, if I heard the remarks of the gentleman correctly, that beginning with October, at least, of 1922, each of the agricultural products would begin to strike the toboggan slide and would be less in their actual value in each succeeding year that had come along and that their comparative value or their purchasing power would be likewise less. But, again, the hard, cold, logic of fact told in figures show the untenable position of the gentleman from Alabama and those who hold with him or those who have a similar political philosophy.

I am now reading the figures.

In October of 1922 the grains, which constitute a very high proportion of the agricultural products of the country, were quoted at 101 in the indexes in comparison with 100 as covering the years 1909 to 1914. In other words, I am using the average price for the years 1909 to 1914 as the base and am calling that 100 per cent. In October of 1922, after the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, the indexes in grains were 101. In October of 1927 the indexes were 128, an increase of 26 per cent, and there is not an October from 1922 to 1927 when the indexes on the grains were not higher than they were in 1922. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. This is so very interesting, I hope the gentleman will permit me to complete this very delightful and entrancing story, then if there is any time left I will be very pleased to yield to the gentleman because I know he has a great interest in the subject.

Fruits and vegetables: In October, 1922, the indexes were 101. In October, 1927, 138, an increase of 36 per cent. Likewise, in all the five years since that time there has never been an October when the price indexes were not higher on fruits and vegetables than they were in 1922.

Meat animals: On the same basis the index in October, 1922, was 113, and October, 1927, 145; and, likewise, not an October in all that length of time when the indexes were not above what they were in 1922.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I regret that the pressure of time and the exceeding interest in these figures will not permit me to yield in the short time I have. If I can get an extension of time, I will be delighted to yield to my good friend from South Carolina who has introduced a good bill for farm relief.

Dairy products: Index in 1922, October, 136; in October of 1927, 139; and not an October in all that time when dairy products prices were not above what they were in 1922.

Poultry products: 159 in 1922, and 167 in 1927, an increase of 7 per cent with likewise not an October below.

And now we come to cotton. I am sorry we do not have a protective tariff on cotton, because the story can not be told with quite so much pleasure and satisfaction, but yet it is pretty good.

In 1922 the index of cotton was 168, and but one month in that whole period of time with no tariff whatsoever, and that the month of October, 1926, when the index upon cotton was not higher than it was in 1922. In October of 1927 it was 169.

Now, to sum it all up, my good friends, I trust that the logic, the cold logic, of these figures that are impersonal and have nothing of a political flavor in them whatsoever, may speak the cold, hard truth, and I hope they will be consulted by the next one of my good Democratic friends who wants to rise up here and declare that the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act has been responsible for the ills of the farmer. Summing it all up by taking 30 of the leading agricultural commodities into consideration, the indexes for 1922 were 123 and in October of 1927, 139, or an increase of 13 per cent on the whole list, and not an October in the whole time when the farm-price index was not higher than that of October, 1922.

And now in answer to the question which I know my good friends have right on their tongues' end, and I want to anticipate them if I can, "Oh, but what the farmer has had to buy is immeasurably higher." Again, let the cold figures answer.

Taking 400 products of the United States sold at retail in the United States, in 1922 the index was 176 and in October of last year that index had decreased to 151; in other words, the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar had been improved and 14 is the percentage of decrease in the price of the products which he has to buy.

Putting it now in a final word and in the terms that the farmer himself usually uses, his commodity dollar—in other words, the amount of his commodities that he would have to exchange for commodities of other kinds that he buys, according to the old plan of trade and barter—his commodity dollar was a 70-cent dollar in October, 1922, and in October last it was a 92-cent dollar, or an increase in the relative purchasing power of the farmer's commodity of 32 per cent since 1922. [Applause.]

My friends, this is the whole story molded in cold, impersonal figures, with no political tinge to them whatever. I think they ought to be used as the basis of any fair, square discussion of the effect of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act upon the agricultural situation of the country.

Again, I want to thank the large number of my colleagues who have gathered here at the closing hour of the day to hear this very prosaic discussion of the subject that was provoked by my good friend, the gentleman from Alabama in his remarks early in the afternoon. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

Mr. KETCHAM. If I have any time I will be very pleased to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I object to any further extension of time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is late in the afternoon, and we are not going to make much more progress on the bill, and this is an important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

METROPOLITAN POLICE

SALARIES

For the pay and allowances of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to fix the salaries of the Metropolitan police force, the United States park police force, and the fire department of the District of Columbia," including compensation at the rate of $1,860 per annum for the present assistant property clerk of the police department, $2,694,727.08.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman had time this afternoon and I desire to finish the reading of the provisions with relation to the police department this afternoon. I have assured Members that the House will adjourn at 5 o'clock.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield before he makes objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already objected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11133, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, on Monday next the Merchant Marine Committee of the House will begin hearings on the various propositions for merchant marine legislation. By authority of the committee I ask unanimous consent that it may sit during sessions of the House while that legislation is before us.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], in reply to suggestions of that kind, invariably asks the Member to make his request for 30 days, and at the end of that time, if occasion requires, permission could be asked for an extension of the time. I hope the gentleman from Maine will comply with that proposition, for the gentleman from Tennessee does not happen to be present.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request to that extent. I hope before the 30 days have passed that we will have concluded the hearings and reported the legislation to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, by authority of the Committee on Merchant Marine, asks unanimous consent that that committee may sit during the sessions of the House during the next 30 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 24, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.
